CORCORAN GALLERY OF ART.

“When from the sacred garden driven
Man fled before his Maker's wrath,
An angel left her place in heaven,
And cross'd the wanderer's sunless path.
’Twas Art! sweet Art! new radiance broke
Where her light foot flew o'er the ground,
And thus, with seraph voice, she spoke:
‘The curse a blessing shall be found!’”

HISTORY OF THE CORCORAN GALLERY OF ART.

THE CORCORAN GALLERY OF ART, including ground, building, its contents, and endowment fund, is the free gift of Mr. Wm. W. Corcoran to the public. In his own words to the Trustees to whom the property was deeded May 10, 1869, "it was designed for the encouragement of the Fine Arts;" and in the deed the object of the institution is stated as "the perpetual establishment and encouragement of Painting, Sculpture, and the Fine Arts generally," with the condition that "it should be open to visitors without charge two days in the week, and on other days at moderate and reasonable charges, to be applied to the current expenses of procuring, and keeping in order the building and its contents."

With these liberal purposes, the institution was chartered by act of Congress, May 24, 1870. By that act the building was declared exempt from all taxation, and authority given to settle the claim for rent during its occupancy by the Government.

The building, planned by Mr. James Renwick, of New York, was begun in 1859. The civil war arrested the work, and early in 1861 the Government took it for the use of the Quartermaster-General's Department, retaining it until four years after the close of the war.

On the 10th of May, 1869, it was restored to its owner, who at once placed it in the hands of a board of nine Trustees, as already stated. After the Institution was incorporated by Congress, in 1870, the general work of reconstruction and adaptation of the building to its original purpose was begun, and after much delay and labor finished in 1871.

On the 22d of February, 1871, Mr. Corcoran generously used the completed building for a grand ball given in honor of the day, the proceeds of which he turned over, without deducting its expenses, to the fund of the Washington Monument Society. It was considered one of the most superb festivals ever seen in this country, every part of the building being thrown open and lighted. In 1873 one of the Trustees, Mr. Walters of Baltimore, went to Europe empowered to purchase works of art for the Gallery, and Mr. Corcoran's private collection of pictures and statuary was then placed in it. On November 6, 1873, the Board of Trustees completed the organization of the Institution, by electing the proper officers for its management and care.

On the 19th of January, 1874, the Picture Galleries, Octagon Room, and the Hall of Bronzes were thrown open for private exhibition by day and night. At this brilliant and crowded inauguration of the artistic purposes of the Institution, Mr. Corcoran received the congratulations of his friends upon the fulfilment thus far of his munificent plans.

On April 29, 1874, the Halls of Sculpture and of Bronzes were opened to the public, and in December, 1874, the two side galleries of sculpture adjoining the Main Hall; so that all the rooms of the Institution for exhibition purposes were then opened to the public—thus realizing, within one year from the time of its first opening, the munificent founder's "hope that there will be provided, at no distant day, not only a pure and refined pleasure for residents and visitors at the national metropolis, but something useful accomplished in the development of American genius."

DESCRIPTION OF THE BUILDING.

The building stands on the northeast corner of Pennsylvania avenue and Seventeenth street, and opposite the War Department. It fronts on the avenue 106 feet 9 inches, and runs back 125 feet 6 inches on Seventeenth street, with a vacant lot, 27 feet wide, extending across its rear. It is two stories in height, built of brick, in the Renaissance style, with brown-stone facings and ornaments, and a mansard roof rising 10 feet above the ordinary one, having a large central pavilion and two smaller ones at the corners. The front is of imposing style, divided by pilasters, with capitals of the Columbian style representing Indian corn, into recesses, four stone niches for statues, with trophies and wreaths of foliage finely carved, the monogram of the founder, and the inscription, "Dedicated to Art."

In the central pediment is a large bronze medallion profile portrait of Mr. Corcoran, with decorations of foliage, and on the tops of the two central columns are bronze groups of children holding garlands, and the emblems of architecture and music. In the four niches in front are statues of Phidias, Raphael, Michael Angelo, and Albert Durer, representing the sister arts of Sculpture, Painting, Architecture, and Engraving. In the niches of the west side on Seventeenth street are statues of Titian, Da Vinci, Rubens, Rembrandt, Murillo, Canova, and Crawford. These eleven statues, of Carrara marble, seven feet in height, were executed by M. Ezekiel, an American sculptor in Rome, as were also the bronze medallion of Mr. Corcoran and groups of children.

The entrance is from Pennsylvania avenue into a vestibule, from which rises a noble stairway 10 feet wide to the picture galleries in the second story. On the right of the entrance are a ladies' apartment and the janitor's rooms. On the left is the Trustees' room, which also is the office of the Curator and Assistant. This room is not open to the public. The dimensions of all the rooms are given in the appended diagrams.

On each side of the stairway, a corridor, lighted from the open courts, leads to the vestibule of the Main Hall of Sculpture, with which the vestibule communicates through three arched entrances. This fine Hall, $95\frac{1}{2} \times 24\frac{1}{2}$ feet, is lighted by seven windows on the north side, and opens into two adjoining galleries of sculpture on the east side of the building. On the west side it opens into the Hall of Bronzes, &c., $61\frac{1}{2} \times 19$ feet. This last also communicates with the Trustees' room, and is the most elegant room in the building. The central portion of the ceiling, panelled and richly decorated, is supported by four Corinthian columns, with gilt capitals. It is lighted by three windows upon Seventeenth street, and as many looking into the open court. The height of this story is 20 feet.

The Picture galleries are in the second story. The ascent to the main gallery is remarkably imposing. The stairway leads to an upper landing, with decorated arched ceiling, and Corinthian pilasters dividing the arched recesses over the eight windows, and with spaces between admirably adapted for statues and busts.

The Main Picture Gallery is 95 feet 9 inches by 44½ feet, with a height of 24 feet to the cornice of the arched ceiling, and 38 feet to the inner sky-light. The wall is of a warm maroon tint. The ceiling is richly frescoed and gilded. The scroll-work decoration is in the Italian style of the 16th century. In the middle of the panel opposite the main entrance is the figure of Minerva, and in the middle of the other panels the muses of Sculpture, Painting, and Architecture, all full length. Between them are medallion-portraits of Giulio Romano, Titian, Raphael, Rubens, Van Dyck, Durer, M. Angelo, Holbein, Murillo, Cranach, Teniers, and Da. Vinci. Between the brackets of the cornice are the names and dates of forty-six painters of different countries from Cimabue to Fortuny. Names of living artists are not given. This decorative work was done by Mr. Vincenzo Stiepeviech, New York. All of the picture galleries are lighted from the roof. This is the only one of them lighted at night by an improved electrical apparatus and a range of 280 burners on a quadrangular gas-pipe, suspended from the ceiling, about the height of the cornice. All the other galleries in the building have chandeliers.

On the east and west sides of the building the Main Gallery opens into smaller ones, and these again into two corner galleries in the front of the building. Between the corner galleries, and immediately opposite the entrance to the Main Gallery, is the Octagon Room. It has a sky-light, but is chiefly lighted by a south window, suitably screened. The wall of this elegant room is covered with maroon paper, that richly relieves the choice statuary there—the Greek Slave being the central ornament.

All the galleries communicate by high arched doorways walnut-grained. The floors are supported by brick arches, sprung from iron girders. In the basement are spacious and dry cellars, not only for fuel, but for the heavy boxes containing works of art, which are there opened and prepared for exhibition. The building is heated by one furnace.

The cost of the building and ground was $250,000. Mr. Corcoran's collection of pictures and statuary was valued at $100,000. The Institution is maintained by an endowment fund of $900,000, yielding an annual income at present of over $70,000.

The Board of Trustees is composed of nine members, who have the power to fill any vacancies in their number, by election.

The Board holds annual meetings on the second Monday of January, when an election of officers occurs, and annual reports are received.

The Gallery is open every day, (Sundays and the Fourth of July excepted,) from 10 A. M. to 4 P. M., from October 1st to May 1st, and from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M., from May 1st to October 1st. On other public holidays from 10 A. M. to 2 P. M.

On TUESDAYS, THURSDAYS, and SATURDAYS, admission FREE.

On MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and FRIDAYS, admission 25 cents.

On MONDAYS, WEDNESDAYS, and FRIDAYS persons are allowed, under certain regulations, to draw from the casts and copy the pictures. A gold medal will be given to the copyist of casts making the most improvement during the year.

Children under six years of age will not be admitted to the Gallery, and none between six and fourteen years will be admitted unless accompanied by a parent or guardian.

Often called the Young Bacchus; but it represents Ariadne as the joyous wife of the God of Wine.

4. BUST OF ANTINOUS AS BACCHUS. H.
2 ft. Marble, in the British Museum.

The original of this fine head was found in the Villa Pamfili, with some fragments of a wall-statue, of which it had been a part.

- 5, 6, 7. BAS-RELIEFS—PAINTING, SCULPTURE, AND ARCHITECTURE.
By Butti. 185—.

These personifications of the Fine Arts are the work of an Italian sculptor, who designed them for the Capitol, but they were never adopted.

8. CAST OF A BAS-RELIEF OF PHŒBUS AND THE HORSES OF THE SUN.
H. W.
33 in. x 6 ft. 7 in.

From a marble block of triglyphs with metope from the Temple of Apollo, found in 1873, by Dr. Schliemann, in the uppermost of the five cities on the site of Hissarlik. Troy, the city of Homer's Iliad, was 33 feet below the ruins in which this metope was found, the ruins of two other cities intervening. The work and the city in which it was discovered were Greek, the colony, called New Ilium, being founded about 700 B. C. The metope is the sole specimen of high art found in any of the ruins, and is assigned to the time of Alexander the Great.

* The measurements of the casts, &c., have been made with care, and give the height of the statues and busts exclusive of their plaster plinths or bases.

RIGHT CORRIDOR.

9. CAST FROM A MARBLE BAS-RELIEF IN THE MUSEO BOURBONICO NAPLES.

According to the names on this cast it represents Antiopa between her sons, Zethus and Amphion, who released their mother from cruel bondage by slaying their uncle Lycus, her oppressor; but over the figures of the original bas-relief are the names of Hermes, (Mercury,) Eurydice, and Orpheus, indicating the meeting of the latter with his lost wife in the realm of Pluto.

10. CAST OF A FRAGMENT OF A WINGED FIGURE IN MARBLE IN THE VATICAN.

11. ETRUSCAN ARM. $\frac{L}{4ft.}$ Original, in bronze, in the Vatican.

Found in the harbor of Civita Vecchia in 1835, and supposed to be part of a statue of Neptune.

12. BUST OF AGRIPPA DE GABIES. Marble, in the Louvre.

The celebrated general to whom Augustus Cæsar was indebted for his success in becoming Emperor of Rome. Agrippa was as great a hero on sea as on land, and it is conceded that the battle of Actium was gained chiefly by his skill. Born B. C. 63. Died A. D. 12.

13. BUST OF ANTINOUS. Marble, in the Louvre.

A Bacchus-like character is imparted to this head by the wreath of ivy, but still it has the air of sadness associated with Antinous.

14. BUST OF ANTONINUS PIUS. Marble, in the Vatican.

Emperor of Rome, and celebrated for his virtuous reign, A. D. 138-161. The original was found by Gavin Hamilton, in Hadrian's villa.

15. BUST OF COMMODUS. Marble, in the British Museum.

Emperor of Rome, A. D. 180-192. Though of revolting sensuality and of luxurious habits, his personal strength and courage made him victor in hundreds of gladiatorial combats.

16. BUST OF CARACALLA. Marble, in the Louvre.

Emperor of Rome, and, after a wicked reign of six years, was assassinated, A. D. 217. His ill-favored features declare his character. He carried his head on one side, in imitation of Alexander the Great.

17. BUST OF VITELLIUS. Marble, in the Louvre.

Born A. D. 15, Aulus Vitellius was one of the worst of Rome's bad emperors. After a reign of less than a year, he was assassinated and his body thrown into the Tiber.

18. HEAD OF APOLLO. Marble, in the British Museum.

The original of this fine head was once in the Giustinani collection, at Rome, and was bought at the sale of the Pourtales collection in 1865, by the British Government for £2,000. It is attributed to the school of Lysippos.

19. BUST OF DIANA DI GABIA. Marble, in the Louvre.

Remarkable for the graceful pose of the head, and its serene expression.

LEFT CORRIDOR.

20. CAST OF A FRAGMENT OF THE MARBLE FRIEZE OF TRAJAN'S FORUM, ROME. In the Vatican.

A fine blending of foliated decoration with the human form, representing Cupid springing from the plant, and pouring out his never-dying flame.

- 21, 22, 23. CASTS OF MARBLE FRAGMENTS IN THE VATICAN: A MASK, A HUNTER, AND A WALKING FIGURE.

24. BUST OF THE CROWNED AUGUSTUS, (CÆSAR.) Marble, in the Louvre.

The first and greatest of Rome's emperors was adopted by his uncle, Julius Cæsar. He died A. D. 14, in his 76th year, after a reign of forty-four years, marked with energy and ability that stamped it with the title of the Augustan Age; resplendent in arts, science, and letters. He justly claimed that "he had found Rome of brick, and left it of marble." His character is displayed in this bust. The head, expanding in the most intellectual mould, seems made for a crown, and the firm, resolute mouth shows ability to rule an empire. There is an obvious resemblance between these lines of character and those of Canova's Napoleon.

25. BUST OF THE YOUNG AUGUSTUS, (CÆSAR.) Marble, in the Vatican.

The original is considered among the finest of antiques. The saying that "the boy is father to the man" is proved in comparing its facial indications of character with those of the emperor just described. There are the same intense expression of the brow and compression of the lips of one born to, and fitted for empire, which, when only nineteen years old, he struggled for successfully.

26. BUST OF SCIPIO AFRICANUS. Marble, in the Vatican.

This great Roman general foiled Hannibal's advance upon Rome by "carrying the war into Africa," and having defeated him in the decisive battle of Zama, acquired the title of Africanus. Born about 241 B. C., and died in his fifty-seventh year.

27. MARCUS AURELIUS. Marble, in the Louvre.
Found at Acqua Traversa, and regarded as a good likeness.

28. BUST OF A BARBARIAN. Marble, in the British Museum.

The original of this cast, so full of savage character, was found in Trajan's Forum, Rome, where many similar ones were discovered, fastened as trophies to the walls.

29. SENECA. Marble, in the Louvre.

This philosopher was born in Spain, and became preceptor of Nero, who put him to death in his sixty-fourth year.

30. BUST OF EURIPIDES. Marble, in the Vatican.

This eminent tragic poet of Greece was born at Salamis on the day when the army of Xerxes was defeated. Though a woman-hater, he seems to have been married twice. He was torn to pieces by dogs, 407 B. C., in his seventy-eighth year.

31. HOMER. Marble, in the British Museum.

The original of this bust was found at Baïæ in 1780. There are many copies, and all are of doubtful authenticity as portraits.

32. CAST OF A SLAB FROM THE FRIEZE OF THE PARTHENON.
Original (Elgin) Marble. British Museum.

VESTIBULE OF THE SCULPTURE HALL.

THE LAST DAYS OF NAPOLEON I.	Height of Statue.	With Pedestal.	L.	W.
	5 ft.	7 ft. 3 in.	4 ft. 8 in.	3 ft. 3 in.
	By Vincenzo Vela. 1871.

This sublime statue is justly considered among the greatest sculptural works of modern times. It was executed for Mr. J. Taylor Johnston, of New York, at the sale of whose collection it was bought for this Gallery. It is a replica of the statue made in 1866, and bought by Napoleon III from the French International Exhibition in 1867, and is now at Versailles. There is some difference in the heads of the two statues, but none changing the character and sentiment of the work. Vela is a Swiss; has followed his profession in Florence and Milan, but now resides at Ligernetto, Canton of Tisson. He is about 50 years old, and a Republican.

Napoleon is seated in a chair, supported by a pillow; a blanket covers his body and legs, but his dressing-gown, partly open, shows his massive but wasted chest. His right hand rests languidly on an arm of the chair; his left, nervously clutched, rests on a map of "Europe of 1814," spread on his lap—that Europe whose boundary lines he had so often altered and obliterated. His head droops forward, and "there is an awful speculation" in the glazed depths of the eyes that gaze earnestly from beneath the classic brow, as though peering into futurity. An indomitable spirit lives in the compressed lips, and the thin nostrils breathe the scorn of a conqueror, though now yielding to the spell of the last conqueror—death. Neither David's "Crossing the Alps" nor De la Roche's "Fontainebleau," in their personations of the Successful General and the Fallen Emperor, stir the heart so deeply as this pathetic image of the dying Imperial Captive.

“ Though, save the few fond friends, and imaged face
Of that fair boy his sire shall ne'er embrace;
None stand by his low bed; though even the mind
Be wavering, which long awed and awes mankind—
Smile, for the fetter'd cage breaks his chain,
And higher worlds than this are his again!”

HALL OF ANTIQUE SCULPTURE.

"If any man be sickly, troubled, or cannot sleep for grief, and shall but stand over one of Phidias' images, he will forget all care, or whatever else may molest him, in an instant."—CHRYSOSTOM.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE OF GREEK SCULPTURE.

The Art of ancient Greece has been to succeeding ages the inspiring source of all excellence in Sculpture and Architecture. Greek Painting may be said to be almost a mere tradition, for though lauded by historians and poets we have few vestiges of it beyond vase-painting, and nothing to attest the skill of Apelles or Zeuxis. Not so with the sister arts. Enough of sculpture and architecture exists to prove the genius of Phidias and Ictinus. We have not only well-preserved temples and statues, but even shattered fragments suggest their perfect glory when entire, and furnish models to artists for all time. Of these, the sculpture of Greece is her noblest legacy.

As Beulé justly says, "the Greeks did not invent art; they invented beauty." Deriving from Egypt and Asia Minor the mechanical and technical means of art, they dropped the dogmas prescribed by priests and rulers. The materials first used were, successively, wood, bronze, ivory, with gold, (chryselephantine,) and, finally, marble from Paros, one of the Ionian islands, whence came the verse of Homer, and the grace and beauty of Greek sculpture.

The 1st Epoch of Greek art extended from Homeric times to 500 B. C. The stiff formality of the Egyptian style gradually gave way to naturalness, constantly aspiring to something above outward form. About 515 B. C. arose Ageladas of Argos, the tutor of Myron, Phidias, and Polycletus. Between 500 and 480 B. C. were executed the great groups of the Temple of Minerva at Egina, now in the Glyptothek at Munich, rivalling the works of the Parthenon, which they preceded by some forty years. This epoch closes with Calamis and Myron of Athens, the last of whom greatly advanced the art of modelling the human form in free natural action.

The 2d Epoch ushered in a new ideal style. It was originated by Phidias of Athens, born 501 B. C., who, combining the vigor of the Doric school with the grace of the Ionians, represented the incidents of mythology with the grandest types of the human form. Before his time, Beulé asserts, there was "an ideal lower than nature," but now Phidias and his followers aimed at "an ideal higher than nature." The condition of the nation favored this great change. Emerging from the influence of Orientalism after her glorious repulse of the Persians, 470 B. C., Greece rapidly developed the vigor and splendor of her native genius in literature, science, philosophy, and the arts. In sculpture, a heroic and religious sentiment blended with her perception of the beautiful. Casting aside the ideal monstrosities of Eastern worship, the Greek mind, through her sculptors, clad its deities with the form of man. Their habits of living developed their bodies into manly vigor, and their becoming dress gave to the forms of their gods and goddesses an august grandeur and grace founded upon nature, but sublimated by the genius of the sculptor. Hence it was said that "Phidias alone had seen the gods and revealed them to man." The Parthenon and its decorations were the chief monuments of his genius, and he closed his career with his sublime statue of Jupiter at Elis. Athens, with her tutelary deity Minerva, became the centre of this rare Hellenic culture, that culminated in the reign of Pericles, about 400 B. C. Within the space of this second epoch (about seventy years) budded, blossomed, and began to fade what many consider the greatest civilization the world ever beheld. But, meanwhile, another school competed with Athens for the honors of sculpture. Polycletus of Argos, a younger contemporary of Phidias, united the naturalness of Myron with the grand repose of Phidias, and established certain exact rules of proportion in modelling the human body that gained him the name of Canon. He was the first to make a statue rest upon one foot, with the other drawn back.

With him also appeared Nancydes, his pupil, who executed a Discobulus, in which thought was blended with grace of form.

3d Epoch. The Peloponnesian war developed new phases of national character that powerfully influenced Greek art. The solemn grandeur of Phidias gave way to the effects of excited passions of states opposed to each other. Great monumental works were seldom made, and private commissions succeeded. Bronze, ivory, and gold were succeeded generally by marble. In this period flourished Scopas and Praxiteles, of the Attic school, who infused grace and beauty into the Phidian style. Soft, mental emotions, and gentle, dreamy repose were the characteristics of their work. The more vigorous Argive school was represented by Lysippus, who followed the exact rules of Polyclethus, and gave more grace and suppleness to the forms of Athletes, as is shown in his Apoxyomenos. At the close of this era the Attic school developed portraiture in such statues as the famous one of Sophocles.

The 4th Epoch extends from the death of Alexander to the conquest of Greece by the Romans, B. C. 146. The extension of the Greeks to the East affected the character of their sculpture, that now seemed chiefly devoted to the service of princes and the demands of luxury. In this era arose the school of Rhodes, under Chares, pupil of Lysippus. There was a tendency to colossal statues, and dramatic subjects, of which the Laocoon is an example. The school of Pergamus also appeared, devoted chiefly to themes of battles with the Gauls. "The Dying Gaul, or Gladiator," deficient in ideal expression or harmony of form, is a product of this school. The supremacy of Greek art rapidly gave way after the Roman conquest, when the freedom and the arts of the vanquished nation went to Rome to grace the triumph of the conqueror. For centuries the Greeks furnished the sculpture of Rome. Viardot says: "None of the Roman writers mention the name of a single native sculptor." It took centuries to infuse into the hard practical Latin, disdainful of the ideal, the skill and genius for that style, and even the Greco-Roman sculpture was generally of an inferior form. The chief business seemed to be to deify Cæsars and execute busts. As time rolled on the art was debased into a system of manufacture. It became a custom to make statues of emperors and statesmen in advance, on which heads were placed on demand. There were, however, intervals of better things; for between Nerva and Hadrian the imperial sculptors vied with the Greeks. Then followed the disruption of the Roman empire by internal strife and external foes; the outburst of Christianity, with its unsparing destruction of Pagan art; until under the death-shade of the Dark Ages the ancient treasures of art, broken, scattered, and hidden, disappeared for centuries. From this entombment suddenly sprang up the Renaissance, through the art discoveries of the fourteenth and succeeding centuries. Explorations unearthed the precious relics of ancient art, and the study of them soon gave birth to that galaxy of genius whereof Ghiberti, Da Vinci, Angelo, and Raphael were fixed stars, recalling the glory of the old Greek firmament.

The extent of these unburied treasures seems incredible. According to Pliny, Rome contained more statues than inhabitants. The Abbé Barthélemy asserts that seventy thousand were dug out; and Pausanias says that Nero brought five hundred bronze statues from the Oracle of Apollo at Delphos.

The Corcoran Gallery of Art has imported authentic casts of notable examples of Greek and Greco-Roman sculpture in the British Museum, and the galleries of Paris, Rome, Florence, and Naples. Examples of Mediæval, Gothic, and modern sculpture are secured, so as to afford to the student and connoisseur an epitome of plastic art, ancient and modern. The most famous of these casts are taken from the Elgin Marbles, brought from the Parthenon, at Athens, by Lord Elgin, 1815, and afterwards sold to the British Government for $175,000.

THE PARTHENON, (Virgin's Chamber,) a Doric temple of white marble, was erected 438 B. C., during the reign of Pericles, in honor of Minerva, (Pallas Athene,) the tutular deity of Athens. Ictinus was the architect, but Phidias was the Director of the Public Buildings, and decorated this famous temple with statues and bas-reliefs. It was 227 feet long and 101 feet in width, with 8 pillars in front and 17 on each side. The height of these columns was 34 feet. A statue of Minerva, 40 feet high, made by Phidias, of ivory and gold, (chryselephantine,) stood in one of the inner chambers of the temple; the more famous statue in bronze of the goddess, by the same artist, 70 feet high, stood outside of the temple, towering over all the buildings of the Acropolis, so that the sheen of her spear-point and helmet could be seen by the mariner afar as he rounded Cape Sunium. In later days the Parthenon was turned into a church of the Virgin. It resisted time and warfare until 1687, when, while in possession of the Turks, it was besieged by the Venetians, and a bomb alighting upon the top rent and scattered its superb form, nearly destroying all the groups of figures in both pediments wrought there by Phidias.

Fortunately, the French artist, Carrey, had visited the temple in 1672, fifteen years before the bombardment, and made careful drawings of the figures of both pediments. They were accidentally found in the Royal Library at Paris in 1799, and from them we can form an excellent idea of the character, arrangement, and grandeur of these pediments as they originally stood. In the "Antiquities of Athens," by Stuart and Revett, may be found engraved copies of Carrey's interesting drawings.

MAIN SCULPTURE HALL.

1. FRIEZE OF THE PARTHENON. Elgin Marble. British Museum.

AROUND THE CORNICE of the Main Hall of Sculpture are placed 194 feet of casts from the original marble slabs, 524 feet in length, that once formed the frieze of the cella, or inner temple of the Parthenon about 30 feet from the ground. These slabs were nearly four feet square, and represented in low relief, not greater than three and a half inches, the great Panathenaic Procession, a fête held every fifth year in honor of Minerva. At the head of it was borne aloft the sacred Peplos, or garment to be placed on the statue of the Goddess; then followed virgins with offerings, animals for sacrifice, chariots, and lastly the mounted young nobility of Athens.

The windows of the north wall break the continuity of the casts of this procession, but the spectator will observe there the seated deities, and turning to the right will see on the east wall the virgins with offerings. Fragmentary groups of the sacrificial oxen and of charioteers follow, but the reliefs on the south and west walls present an unbroken line of the young horsemen, sweeping along, with here and there a dismounted group varying the action of the cavalcade. This last section of the reliefs is arranged precisely as the originals stood in the Parthenon.

Mutilated as these reliefs are, it is impossible not to feel the amazing genius shown in the endless variety of attitudes of the human figures and of the rushing steeds, which last, in accordance with the method of the Greek sculptors, when represented alongside of men, are much smaller than is strictly natural.

Dr. Lubke says of this procession: "They present every grade, from solemn repose to ardent action; and yet there is a calm festivity, a breath of eternal cheerfulness and beauty, diffused over them. In it we see the noble bloom of maidenhood, the fresh strength of young manhood, and the solemn dignity of magistrates—a festive procession of the assembled citizens of Athens passing up to the Citadel, at the close of the Panathenaic games, to present to Minerva the sacred Peplos." We can imagine the effect of such a procession ascending the Acropolis, and passing along its classic fanes of Pentelican marble, under the bright sky of Attica. And yet, in spite of all these works, here and in other cities of Greece, Phidias fell a victim to the envy of his enemies. He was first accused of purloining part of the gold used in the colossal statue of Minerva, and was acquitted; but because he placed his name, with that of his patron Pericles, upon the shield of the goddess, he was accused of profanity, thrown into prison, and died there.

The engraving on page 17, taken from Carrey's drawing, shows the east and west pediments of the Parthenon as they stood when sketched by him in 1672, and the arrangement in them of the chief figures of the Elgin Marbles, casts of which are described below.

The west pediment represented the contest between Neptune and Minerva for the possession of Attica. Neptune, by a blow of his trident, caused a horse to spring from the rock; but Minerva at once caused the peaceful olive to shoot up, and was declared the victor. The group represented Neptune striding away in wrath, while the goddess mounts her car in triumph. The sketch will show the principal figures, but sadly mutilated. In the left angle of this pediment reclines the figure of Ilissus, the river-god.

The east pediment represented the birth of Minerva. Its central portion vanished centuries since. On the left side is the recumbent figure of Theseus, and on the right the group of the Three Fates. In the left extreme angle are the Horses of Hyperion (Day) rising from the sea, typifying the dawn of civilization with the birth of Minerva, and in the opposite angle the Horse of Night, descending, emblematic of the disappearance of ignorance. Such is the profound meaning of these groups and single figures.

2. THESEUS. $\frac{H.}{4 \text{ ft. } 2\frac{3}{4} \text{ in.}} \times \frac{L.}{5 \text{ ft. } 9 \text{ in.}}$ Elgin Marble. British Museum.

The original reclined in an angle of the east pediment of the Parthenon, and represents the reputed founder of Athens. As late as 1672 the left foot had not disappeared, nor was the head battered. The cast faithfully shows the flakiness caused by time and weather. The elaborate finish of the back part of this and other figures in the pediments is most remarkable. Placed at a height of sixty feet, it is not probable that human eye ever beheld those parts near the wall from the time Phidias raised them there until Lord Elgin took them down, and in view of this needless but conscientious finish, we feel the force of the reply made by Phidias to one who asked why he took such pains with what nobody would see—"The gods see them!"

3. ILISSUS. $\frac{H.}{2 \text{ ft. } 8 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{L.}{6 \text{ ft. } 4 \text{ in.}}$ Elgin Marble. British Museum.

The correct name of this figure, that stood in the north angle of the west pediment of the Parthenon, is Cephissus. Both are names of streams that supplied Athens with water, and hence the Greek mind personified them as river-gods. He is represented as raising himself from a recumbent position on one arm to listen to the announcement of the triumph of Minerva over Neptune. But whether Ilissus or Cephissus, this great figure and the Theseus, by the modelling of their massive chests, the lithe curvature of back and loins, and the anatomical knowledge displayed in every limb, will forever remain unequalled examples of heroic sculpture.

4. THE TWO FATES. $\frac{H.}{4 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{L.}{7 \text{ ft. } 7 \text{ in.}}$ Elgin Marble. British Museum.

This cast represents two of the three sisters (Parcæ) that once stood in the east pediment, and sloping towards the angle opposite Theseus. In Carrey's drawing the entire form of the third figure is seen seated beside them, and only one of the others is headless. They are supposed by some to represent the daughters of Cecrops. Depending upon no display of nude charms, these majestic forms—particularly the recumbent figure—impress us by the noble elegance of their pose and the graceful lines of their draperies.

It is said these figures furnished the French painter Couture with one of the most striking groups in his picture of "A Roman Orgy."

5. HEAD OF A HORSE OF HYPERION, (the Sun.) $\frac{H.}{2 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.}}$

Elgin Marble. British Museum.

The original stood in the extreme angle of the pediment of the Parthenon, representing the birth of Minerva, and in this steed of the Sun is personified the dawn of civilization following that event, while the retreating shade of barbarism was represented in the head of the Horse of Night (No. 6) in the opposite angle of the pediment. Though woefully battered, there remains enough of correct modelling and spirited action in them to show the hand of a great master.

7. THE DISCOBOLUS, (Quoit-thrower.) $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 5\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ British Museum.

The original statue was executed in bronze by Myron at the close of the first period of Greek sculpture, about 470 B. C., and is minutely described by Lucian and Quintilian. The discus was a round flat plate of metal or stone, about ten or twelve inches in diameter, and when thrown it took a rotary motion. There are several antique copies in marble of this figure, showing the head reverted, the finest of which is in the Massimi Palace, Rome. The copy from which this cast is taken was found in 1791, near Hadrian's Villa.

PEDIMENTS OF THE PARTHENON, ATHENS.

8. DISCOBOLUS.

H.
5 ft. $5\frac{3}{4}$ in.

Marble, in the Vatican.

The original of this cast is by Naucydes, pupil of Polyclethus, who was a pupil of Phidias, and consequently the work is worthy of its age and author. The head is supposed not to have formed a part of the original figure—why, it is difficult to imagine; for its form and expression seem in harmony with the action of the body, that so well represents arrested purpose. This fine expression of thoughtful suspense shows the superiority of the work over that of Myron, his predecessor, whose Discobolus, great as it is, merely represents physical activity. The fillet round the head was the badge of victory.

9. VENUS OF MELOS.

H.
6 ft. 8 in.

Marble, in the Louvre.

The original of this cast was discovered in 1820, in the island of Milo, the ancient Melos, by a peasant, while digging near some sepulchral grottoes. The earth suddenly gave way, and this Venus was found in a rocky cave with a Mercury and some pedestals. The French Consul tried to buy it, but a cunning monk, in disgrace with the Sultan, secured it as a peace-offering to the Porte. While the statue was on its way to a ship, a French frigate arrived with a secretary of the French embassy, bearing orders to purchase and hurry it off. A fight occurred over it between the French sailors and natives, and the former carried off the prize. The peasant received six thousand francs for this invaluable statue, that went to Paris as a present to Charles X. It now stands in the Louvre, the pride of Paris, and the admiration of the world. Its sculptor is unknown, but by the grandeur of its style it is justly assigned to the era between Phidias and Praxiteles, and is considered the greatest statue of woman's form the world now holds. The plinth, the left foot, the tip of the nose, and a small part of the lips are the only parts restored. Parts of an arm and hand also were found, but so mutilated that though casts have been taken with them attached, the glorious torso is declared by the world better as it is—the fullness of what is left, and its suggested action, being more satisfactory than any guess-work from an uninspired hand. When the Germans besieged Paris, this favorite statue was boxed and buried beyond reach of shot, under the Prefecture of Police; and on their withdrawal a new foe—the Commune—arose and burnt the Prefecture to the ground, to the dismay of every admirer of the statue, which it was feared was turned into lime-dust. On searching for her, it was found a bursted water-pipe had saved her—she was uninjured. The moisture, however, had destroyed the cement at the junction of the two sections at her waist, and in it were discovered some wooden wedges, which had for fifty years given to the upper part of the figure an inclination not designed by the sculptor. These were removed, and the sections closely uniting, it is said a new and more agreeable position was given to the goddess.

What was the action expressed by this noble figure when complete? There is nothing of the ordinary Cyprian Venus about it. From every point of view the form preserves its dignity and grace, and the majestic head and face are full of serene, earnest thought. Mr. Ravaisson, keeper of the Antiques at the Louvre, who discovered the wedges, and restored the statue to its original position, thinks it probable that the statue is part of a group of Venus and Mars—"Love disarming War"—woman taking from man the fiercer traits of character; and he has made a cast, with the arms attached, which it is said confirms his theory. Then, again, it is asserted that a small bronze copy of it has been discovered in Pompeii representing her as looking at herself in a mirror held in her left hand, and therefore the outrageous inference is drawn by some, that this august form was once engaged in such an act of coquetry!

Mr. Millingen, a Dutch antiquary, thinks it a Victory holding a shield with both hands, and Mr. Stillman, a recent critic, contends that it is the Wingless Victory that once stood in the Temple of Nikè-Apteros, Athens, and sent to Melos at the time of a threatened invasion.

The Venus of Capua in the Museo Bourbonico, Naples, is like the Venus of Melos in general form, but has the head bent down and the left arm and empty hand extended towards a Cupid, who, with his bow, stands before her. It is believed to be a modified copy of the latter.

All these theories, however, are set at naught, and the action of the Venus of Melos settled, if there be truth in the following evidence of its condition when found, as quoted by O'Shea, in his "Galleries of the Louvre." The eminent traveller, Dumont D'Urville, landed from the French frigate soon after its discovery, and after an inspection, says in his account of it published in 1821: "The statue was in two parts, and about six feet high, representing a nude female whose left hand (raised) held an apple, and the right one held up a tunic falling gracefully from the waist to the feet. However, they (the hands) were mutilated and separated from the body." An officer of the man-of-war, writing about the statue, says: "When M. D'Urville and myself saw the statue it had the left arm raised in the air, and holding in its hand an apple, and the right arm was broken at its narrow part—à la saignée." O'Shea also states that the forearm and hand holding the apple are in the store-room of the Louvre.

This contemporary evidence seems to prove conclusively that the statue is a Venus Victrix in the contest for the apple with Juno and Minerva. The august expression of her face and form may be explained as that of a proud consciousness that even thus much of her charms were more than enough to prove her supreme beauty—an expression and attitude showing neither the flutter of eager expectation, nor doubt of the result, nor vulgar triumph over her rivals.

10. VENUS DE MEDICI. H.
5 ft. Marble, in Florence.
Presented by J. C. McGuire, Esq.

This excellent cast of the Goddess of Love, though somewhat injured by exposure to the weather, is regarded as a perfect copy, its extreme fidelity having carried off a prize in Italy. The original stands in the Tribunal of the Uffizi, Florence. It was found in the 15th century and carried to Venice during the reign of Cosmo di Medicis—hence its name. When found it was in thirteen pieces, and without arms. These were supplied, but it is supposed by many that the position of the original arms is not given in the substitutes. It was executed by Cleomenes of Athens at a period when Greek art was rapidly declining. Though it has been characterized as "the statue that enchants the world," there is no famous work of sculpture that has been more the subject of diverse criticism.

11. VENUS OF THE CAPITOL. H.
5 ft. 11 in. Marble, in the Capitoline Museum, Rome.

The back of this figure is particularly fine. The vase below the drapery is a symbol of the bath.

12. ARIADNE DESERTED. H.
5 ft. 3½ in. L.
6 ft. 10½ in. Marble, in the Vatican.

Ariadne, daughter of Minos, King of Crete, was married to Theseus, who deserted her at Naxos. She was afterwards loved by Bacchus, and married to him. This supine recumbent figure was once supposed to represent Cleopatra, but the learned critic Visconti proved that the asp on the arm—the supposed proof of its being the Queen of Egypt—was only an armlet of serpent-like form. For three centuries it adorned a fountain in the Vatican. It now stands on an ancient sarcophagus, the sides of which represent, in bas-reliefs, giants destroyed by thunderbolts. Lubke assigns the execution of this statue to the period of Augustus Cæsar.

13. EUTERPE. H.
4½ ft. Marble, in the Louvre.

The Inventress of song and wind instruments is here crowned, and holding a pipe or flute in each hand. Though the face of the original seems to have been much injured, yet its pleasant air, easy attitude, and graceful drapery are remarkable. It was once in the Villa Borghese.

14. DIANA DI GABIA. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 6 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Louvre.

This statue takes its name from the place where it was found in 1792. It is also called Atlanta adjusting her robe. This is perhaps the most beautiful draped statue known. In point of maidenly grace, purity of expression, and the exquisite lines of the drapery, it has no equal.

15. GENIUS OF THE VATICAN. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 33\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

This beautiful work was found at Centicelli, between Rome and Palæstrina, and has been by some pronounced an Eros, or Cupid, by Praxiteles. It represents that dreamy state when the form is passing into young manhood.

16. ABUNDANCE, OR PLENTY. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 6 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

One of the noblest draped statues antiquity has left us. It has the cornucopia in the left hand, while the right holds a rudder resting on a globe, thus indicating Commerce as a source of Plenty.

17. MINERVA. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 7\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

This imposing statue of the goddess of wisdom, of war, and all liberal arts, is often called Minerva Medica. The serpent is a special attribute of Minerva as an emblem of wisdom. The griffin is also sacred to her, and appears on her helmet. In surveying the austere dignity of her statue, there seems point in the Greek epigram, "that only a cow-keeper like Paris could have preferred Venus to Minerva!"

18. GENIUS OF ETERNAL REST. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 5 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Louvre.

The original of this impressive cast formerly belonged to Cardinal Mazarin. It is a perfect illustration of the Greek sentiment that always expressed death with types of beauty. The figure leans against a pine tree, the resin of which was used in funeral ceremonies. The left leg is considered perfect in design and delicate contour.

19. GERMANICUS. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 5 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

Germanicus was emperor of the eastern division of the Roman Empire, A. D. 19, and celebrated for his military genius, learning, and benevolence. Some consider it to be a statue of a Roman orator, in the character of Mercury, the god of eloquence, of whom the tortoise below the drapery is an emblem. It is inscribed, "Cleomenes, son of Cleomenes, made this." The head is supposed by some not to be the original one. The statue seems to represent the mature vigor of middle age, combining strength in the chest and arms, with light compactness of the legs. It is supported by a graceful fold of drapery, instead of a heavy tree-trunk, thereby leaving in full outline the contour of the lower limbs. No published authority seems to have explained the action of the right arm and uplifted hand, holding a small substance like a bean. It is supposed that the figure represents some solemn decision by the vote of the emperor.

20. ANTINOUS, OF THE CAPITOL. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 5 \text{ ft. } 10\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Capitol.

Antinous was a handsome youth, beloved by the Emperor Hadrian, to whom he was so much attached that he drowned himself in the Nile to save his imperial master from the death foretold to him, unless saved by such a sacrifice. Hadrian immortalized his favorite by raising temples and statues to his memory. He is generally represented with a pensive declination of his head, as though in sad foreboding of his early doom. This statue is considered a perfect embodiment of young, graceful manhood.

21. THE FIGHTING HERO, OR GLADIATOR. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 5 \text{ ft., and from head to foot, } 6\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.} \end{matrix}$ Marble, in the Louvre.

This most spirited of all statues, ancient or modern, was found on the coast near Antium—very near the spot where, a century earlier, the Apollo Belvedere was found. The stem supporting it is inscribed in Greek letters, "Agasias, son of Dosithus, the Ephesian, made it," and therefore it is a specimen of Greek sculpture of the Fourth Epoch, that ended with the Roman conquest. It is now asserted that this statue does not represent a gladiator, but a foot soldier, defending himself against a horseman; and that gladiators were principally slaves, who fought with more or less armor. Viardot insists that it is Greek, and represents an athlete of the Hellenic games, gladiators not being known to that people, but were of Roman origin. Whatever may be the character represented, the world agrees in the perfection of its bold, energetic style, the nervous tension of the whole body, the combined readiness for attack and defence, and the firm, defiant brow.

22. GROUP OF THE LAOCOON.

Marble, in the Vatican.

H.
6 ft. $\frac{1}{2}$ in. to top of head.

This magnificent cast was made from the original in the Vatican, and was presented to George the Fourth. The original work belongs to the 4th epoch of Greek sculpture of the School of Rhodes, and in merit ranks in the second class. It was executed by three sculptors—Agesandrus, Atheodorus, and Polydorus. It was found in Rome in 1506, and the Pope ordered a public festival in honor of its discovery. According to Pliny, it once stood in the palace of Titus. Laocoon was a priest of Apollo, and the god, being offended, sent two serpents, that killed him and his two sons at the altar, while offering sacrifice to Neptune.

When found in the ruins of the Baths of Titus, the right arm was wanting. One in terra cotta, by Bernini, was substituted. Michael Angelo designed one in marble, but never finished it. Lubke and other writers insist that the right arm was not originally in the position given to it by the great sculptor, but was bent down behind the head, which was thus supported by the hand in that moment of exhausted agony. This position of the arm is often given in engravings. Lubke thus comments upon this famous work: "From three different scenes one united and strictly connected group is formed, depicting the one moment of utmost suffering and horror petrified with fearful truth, and the whole pathos is concentrated in the mighty figure of the father. * * * Yet we see nothing here but pure physical suffering. The impression is entirely pathological, for no moral idea, no tragic conflict, no allusion to guilt and expiation, meets us; and in this lies the barrier, the contrast, between it and the Niobe, and other works of a former age. Nevertheless, the composition and the execution are masterly, and worthy of admiration."

23. APOXYOMENOS.

H.
6 ft. $\frac{5}{8}$ in.

Marble, in the Vatican.

This cast represents an athlete scraping from his arm with the strigil the dust of the arena. Athletes were contestants in the public games, and before entering the arena rubbed their naked bodies over with oil. The victors received great honors. The original was in bronze, and executed by Lysippus, of the Argine school. He was the leader of the physical style that succeeded the grand, solemn manner of Phidias. His works were numerous, and extended to the time of Alexander the Great, who would allow no one else to model his form. He was fond of depicting the labors of Hercules, and originated the style in which that demi-god is usually represented. Though his style was purely physical he followed the rules of Polykletus carefully, and gave a peculiar grace and suppleness to his figures. This statue is considered about the finest example of his work. It was found near Trastevere in 1846. Agrippa had placed it in front of the Thermæ, near the Pantheon, and it was so popular that when Tiberius attempted its removal to his own residence, the people rose and forbade it.

It is believed that the five-spot on the die (tessera) held out in the right hand signifies that the figure came out fifth in the contest.

24. BUST OF NERO. Marble, in the Louvre.

On surveying this portrait of the most wicked of Rome's emperors, the general idiotic mould of the head almost disposes one to think that Nero could not have been morally responsible for his cruelties, in spite of the eat-like expression of the eyes.

25. AJAX. Marble, in the British Museum.

This bust of one of the Greek leaders at the siege of Troy, Diomede, has been erroneously called Ajax. It was found in 1771 by Mr. Gavin Hamilton in the Pantibella, Hadrian's Villa.

26. SILENUS AND INFANT BACCHUS. H.
6 ft. 4 in. Marble, in the Louvre.

The original of this superb cast was found in the 16th century, in the gardens of Sallust, at Rome. The hands, half of the right forearm, and right toes of Silenus, and left leg of Bacchus, are restorations. Notwithstanding the pointed ears and rude nose of the Faun, the expression of his face is benevolently human, and reflects with luminous kindliness the smiling face of the young Bacchus. The legs of Silenus are considered to be of remarkable excellence, and the close observer will not fail to perceive the goat-like sinewiness towards the back of the ancles. Silenus, though a sylvan deity, and the tutor and friend of Bacchus, is more frequently represented as a fat, intoxicated old man, crowned with ivy and flowers, riding on an ass.

27. VENUS CALLIPYGOS. H.
5 ft. 1 in. Marble, in the Naples Museum.

So called from the Greek definition of its peculiar character. It was once in the Farnese Palace, Rome. Casts of it are in great demand. The back of the figure is particularly admired. It is said that the head and the right leg below the knee are restorations.

28. BOY WITH GOOSE. H.
33½ in. Marble, in the Vatican.

Found in 1789, at Civita Vecchia, Applan Way. It is thought to be copied from a bronze work by Boetius, of Carthage. Heads of the child and goose, with the wing tips, are restorations.

29. YOUTH SUPPLICATING. H.
4 ft. 2½ in. Bronze, at Berlin.

The original of this exquisite statuette is said to have been found in the Tiber. From Clement XI it passed through several hands to the King of Prussia. Right hand and part of the forearm are restorations.

30. ACHILLES BORGHESE. H.
6 ft. 9 in. Marble, in the Louvre.

The original of this cast was formerly in the Villa Borghese, whence its name. Its proper name is doubtful, as the figure is not of that heroic mould we associate with the Greek hero, in spite of the helmet, the lance once held in his right hand, and the anklet supposed to guard the only vital part of his body. Clarac thought it a copy of a bronze by Alcamenes, favorite pupil of Phidias. Visconti first gave it the name of Achilles, but Winkelman thinks it a statue of Mars, and that the ring or anklet indicated the custom of the Spartans of chaining up the God of War, "that he might never leave them."

31. MERCURY. H.
6½ ft. Marble, in the Vatican.

This statue was once called Antinous, but Visconti has proved it to be Mercury. It was found on the Esquiline Hill, near the baths of Titus. The right arm and left hand were never restored, but the right thigh and both lower legs are modern. The lower part of the statue is notably inferior to the bust and head, which show a blended strength and grace peculiar to the works of Lysippus, to whom Lubke attributes the work.

33. CROUCHING VENUS. $\frac{H}{2 \text{ ft. } 8\frac{3}{4} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.
 The original statuette was found at Salone, on the road from Rome to Palestrina. The left hand, right forearm, and upper part of the head are modern. The antique base found with it is inscribed "Boupalos made." It is said, however, that sculptor lived in an earlier age, and that the statuette is supposed to be by Dædalus, of the Argive school. It is mentioned by Pliny as standing in the porch of Octavia, in the Temple of Jupiter, at Rome.
34. VENUS AT THE BATH. $\frac{H}{27 \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Louvre.
 Much of this figure is of modern restoration. It is supposed to be a copy of the Venus of Polycharmes, which Pliny says was taken to Rome in his time.
35. BONE-PLAYER. $\frac{H}{2 \text{ ft. } \frac{3}{4} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Louvre.
 The original of this beautiful statue was found at Rome in 730. The right hand, neck, and left shoulder, are modern. The game of Tali, or playing with bones, was a favorite one with the ancients.
36. COLOSSAL BUST OF ÆSCULAPIUS. $\frac{H}{21 \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in British Museum.
 Æsculapius was supposed to be the son of Apollo, and was taught medicine by Chiron, the Centaur. He was the chief medical officer to the famous Argonautic expedition, and saved so many lives that Pluto induced Jupiter to destroy him with a thunderbolt. Divine honors were paid him. The original of this cast was found in the island of Milo (Melos) in 1828, and is conjectured to have been made about 300 B. C. It evidently formed part of a statue, and is of the true Phidian grandeur in style.
37. JULIA. $\frac{H}{4 \text{ ft. } 5\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.
 The original of this statue was found on the coast of Barbary, at Ben Ghuzi, and is sometimes called A Young Roman Girl. Julia was the mother of the Emperor Caracalla, and, after his decease, through grief, starved herself to death. It is interesting as a study of drapery, and gives a correct idea of the costume of that age.
38. DEMOSTHENES. $\frac{H}{6 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.
 This cast is from the finest statue known of the greatest Greek orator, whose denunciatory speeches against Philip of Macedon have given to that species of oratory the name of philippic. He is here represented as in the act of rolling up his speech at the close of an oration. Born 383 B. C. Died in his 62d year.
39. SOPHOCLES. $\frac{H}{6 \text{ ft. } 5\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Lateran Rome.
 The renowned tragic poet, soldier, and statesman of Athens, died 406 B. C., in his 91st year, from exultation over one of his prize poems read at the Olympian Games. This statue is considered an unequalled model of dignity and manly grace.
40. ARISTIDES. $\frac{H}{6\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.}}$ Marble, in the Naples Museum.
 Found in Herculaneum. It is supposed to represent Aristides exhorting the Spartans to resist the Persians under Mardonius. Canova is said to have always paused before it when entering the Museum. Though Aristides was surnamed "The Just," on account of his virtues, he was banished from Athens. Subsequently recalled, he led in the battles of Salamis and Plataea, but dying in poverty was buried at the public expense.
41. BUST OF SOCRATES. Marble, original in the Louvre.
 The ugliness of this portrait of the greatest of ancient philosophers was the occasion of a noted utterance of wisdom from him; for when a physiognomist said his features declared a nature depraved and licentious, Socrates restrained his disciples from killing the supposed slanderer by saying his assertions were true, for he really was by nature all he was charged with, but that he had by wisdom subdued and kept under his vicious passions. He was also brave in battle, having once saved the lives of his pupils, Xenophon and Aleibiades. Notwithstanding his efforts to enforce virtue and temperance, he offended the authorities of Athens, and was condemned to death by drinking hemlock in his 70th year—400 B.C.

42. BUST OF HOMER. Marble, in the Louvre.

This bust is very like the one in the British Museum. The original was found inserted in a granite wall in Rome.

43. COLOSSAL BUST OF JUPITER. $\frac{H.}{32\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

The original in marble of this grand cast is in the Vatican, and was found at Otricoli, 40 miles from Rome. There are several copies, and all are supposed to be modelled after the head of the grand statue of Jupiter, by Phidias, at Elis, and which stood for eight hundred years, until it was destroyed in the fifth century of the Christian era. The grandeur of this head of the king of gods makes one exclaim, "The front of Jove himself!"

"He spoke, and awful bends his sable brows,
Shakes his ambrosial curls, and gives the nod,
The stamp of fate, and sanction of the god."

Lubke says of it: "The mighty locks, raised in the centre, and falling down on both sides, the compressed forehead, with the bold, arched brows, from under which the large eyes seem to glance over the universe, the broad projecting nose, express energy and wisdom, while mild benevolence rests on the full, parted lips, and the luxuriant beard and rounded cheeks show sensual power and imperishable manly beauty." We can imagine the grandeur of the original statue from this faint shadow of it. The tradition is that when Phidias finished it he prayed for a token from Jupiter whether his work was acceptable, and a flash of lightning through the roof attested the Thunderer's approval.

44. CARYATID. $\frac{H.}{7 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

The original of this imposing columnar figure is from the Pantheon at Rome. It takes its name from Caryæ, in Arcadia, the citizens of which aided the Persians, and, after the defeat of the latter, the Greeks severely punished them by burning their cities, killing the men, and carrying off the women into captivity. To perpetuate the record of their being enslaved, images of their forms were used to support temples and porticoes. The figure columns of men were called Atlantes. Many of these columns were brought to Rome after the conquest of Greece.

45. POLYHYMNIA. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Louvre.

The muse of song is here represented leaning upon a rock of Helicon, listening to the melody around her. The statue was once in the Villa Borghese. Only the lower half is said to be antique, the remainder being restored by Augustino Penna from a bas-relief on a sarcophagus in the Capitol. In addition to its air of listening repose, the figure is an admirable model of drapery.

46. APOLLO SAUROKTONOS, (Lizard-Killer.) $\frac{H.}{4 \text{ ft. } 10\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Louvre.

There are many copies of the original in bronze by Praxiteles, 3d or Alexandrian period. The young god is divining future events from the twistings of the lizard, which reptile was considered by the ancients a creature of presage. In this work Praxiteles has adopted the idea first embodied by Polyclethus, of making his statue rest upon one leg.

47. FLORA. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 5\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, Capitoline Museum, Rome.

The Roman Goddess of Flowers, and by its graceful drapery a fit pendant to the Diana of Gabié.

48. PUDICITIA, Goddess of Modesty. $\frac{H.}{6 \text{ ft. } 9 \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

49. CENTAUR AND CUPID. $\frac{H.}{4 \text{ ft. } 6\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Louvre.

When celebrating the battles between the Lapithæ and Centaurs the Greek sculptors represented the latter as half man and half horse, from their always being mounted on horses.

The original of this cast was found at Villa Fonesca. There is another in the Vatican, and it is doubtful which is the copy. The winged figure is thought by Viardot to be a Bacchus, and not Cupid, as he has an ivy-wreath—showing that the Centaur is under the effect of wine, and not of love.

50. DAUGHTER OF NIOBE. H.
5 ft. 6 in. Marble, in the Vatican.

Niobe, proud of her seven sons and seven daughters, taunted Latona with having but two children, Apollo and Diana. The latter avenged the insult by slaying with arrows all of the children of Niobe, who, overcome with grief, turned to stone. The story simply means the punishment by the gods of human arrogance over good fortune.

This cast, headless and armless, represents one of the daughters of Niobe fleeing from the merciless arrows of Diana, and is considered the finest of the whole group of fourteen figures, by the fine portrayal of rapid flight in the action of the figure, and the breezy effect of the drapery. The original group was brought from Asia Minor by Sosius, and is supposed to be the work of either Scopas or Praxiteles in the third period of Greek art. It was found in Rome in 1583. Most of the figures, fourteen in number, are in Florence.

51. FAUN OF THE CAPITOL. H.
5 ft. 7 in. Marble, Capitoline Museum.

The original was found at Civita Lavinia in 1701, and is supposed to have been copied from the bronze statue by Praxiteles called Periboetos. Fauns were rustic deities with pointed ears and a small tail, supposed to inhabit the woods, and embody the soft, dreamy influences of nature's sounds. The character of a sensuous sylvan life is well represented in the smiling repose of this figure. This beautiful work gave to Hawthorne the idea of his story of "The Marble Faun."

52. FAUN, WITH KID. H.
4 ft. 5 in. Marble, at Madrid.

The springy step and upward turn of the head of this faun, together with the struggling kid, make a rustic group of great spirit.

53. FAUN, a la Tache. Marble, in the Louvre.

This bust of a laughing Faun takes its French designation from a spot or stain on the right cheek and shoulder of the original marble.

54. ATHLETE POURING OIL INTO HIS HAND. H.
4 ft. 9½ in.

Taken from the original, in marble, in the Louvre, and represents an athlete preparing for a contest in the public games. It is said that the head, though antique, did not belong to this statue. The left lower leg, right arm, and parts of the feet are modern.

55. DYING GAUL OR GLADIATOR. H. L.
23 in. x 5 ft. 11 in. Marble, in the Capitoline Museum, Rome.

Like the Fighting Hero, this famous statue is no longer considered by critics to represent a gladiator, but a savage Gaul, who has stabbed himself to avoid captivity, and fallen upon his shield, his sword lying beside him. The rough suit of hair, the rugged figure, and knotty joints are submitted as proofs of this. It is supposed to be a copy of the bronze figure, by Ctesilaus, of the School of Pergamus, 246 B. C., who chiefly represented battles with the Gauls that invaded Asia Minor. It is also said that it represents a Greek herald, with his horn lying beside him upon the oval shield. However satisfactory these views may be to the learned critics, the world at large agrees with Byron, who saw before him—

"A gladiator lie :

He leans upon his hand; his manly brow
Consents to death, but conquers agony,
And his droop'd head sinks gradually low,
And through his side the last drops, cbbing slow

From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
 Like the first of a thunder-shower; and now
 The arena swims around him. He is gone
 Ere ceased the inhuman shout that hailed the wretch who won!"

56. VENUS ANADYOMENE. ^{H.}
 4 ft. 10 in. Marble, in the Vatican.

The title of this beautiful Venus signifies coming from the sea, and the goddess is represented nude to the waist, wringing the water from her locks. It was thought by Visconti to have been copied from a painting by Apelles, and a bronze statue found at Herculaneum in the Naples Museum resembles it.

57. MERCURY IN REPOSE. ^{H.}
 3 ft. 6 in. Museum, Naples.

The original in bronze of this cast is classed among the finest of ancient date, and was found in Herculaneum in 1758. Its base is the only modern part. The left hand is supposed to have held the caduceus. Mercury was the messenger of the gods, and guarded the fortunes of shepherds, travellers, merchants, orators, and also of thieves. He was supposed to wear a winged cap, and also wings attached to his sandals. In this statue the bosses of these last under his feet would naturally prevent standing. He invented the lyre, and gave it to Apollo in exchange for the caduceus, or winged staff. He is generally represented nude and youthful. In the grace and naturalness of this statue Lubke recognizes the style of Lysippus.

58. APOLLO BELVEDERE. ^{H.}
 7 ft. 1 in. Marble, in the Vatican.

The original of this very popular statue was discovered at Capo d'Anzo (Antium) early in the 16th century, and placed by Michael Angelo in the Belvedere Gallery, Rome, whence its name. The name of its sculptor is unknown. Its date is placed at B. C. 279. Canova and Visconti think it is a copy from an ancient bronze by Calamus. The arms below the elbow and part of the cloak were restored by Montorsolvo, pupil of Michael Angelo. Undoubtedly many copies of the original were made, and a bronze copy discovered in 1792 at Parameythia, and now at St. Petersburg, in the judgment of some has changed entirely the meaning of the action of the figure. Apollo is here represented as holding a bow and discharging an arrow at the serpent Python, sent by Juno to destroy his mother, Latona. In the bronze statuette referred to, there is no tree trunk, (necessary to support a figure in marble,) but the left hand holds a shield bearing the head of Medusa, supposed to turn all gazers into stone, and which Homer, in the Iliad, xv, 318, says Jupiter lent to Apollo. Dr. Lubke accepts this explanation of the action of the figure, and says "not until now have we understood the statue." In either case the action of the figure is full of divine scorn, as with elastic step forward the proud head turns towards the object of his wrath. Winkelman says: "To realize its merits, the mind must soar to the realm of incorporeal beauty and imagine a celestial nature, for there is nothing mortal here." Thomas Campbell, the poet, has finely said in prose: "He looks as if he had just stepped from the sun—his limbs saturated with light, and buoyant with the spirit of Heaven!"

In spite of all attempts of critics to explain away the time-honored impression of what this glorious figure is doing, the world will ever take Byron's description as the true one, and view him as—

—"The Lord of the unerring bow,
 The God of life, and poesy and light—
 The Sun in human limbs arrayed, and brow
 All radiant from his triumph in the fight:
 The shaft has just been shot—the arrow bright
 With an immortal's vengeance; in his eye
 And nostril beautiful disdain, and might
 And majesty, flash their full lightnings by,
 Developing in that one glance the deity!"

59. COLOSSAL MASK OF JUNO. ^{H.}
 3 ft. 3 in.

This superb head is from the copy, in marble, in the Villa Ludovisi,

Rome, of the original statue by Polyclethus, the Argive sculptor, about 423 B. C. Nothing can be finer than its truly regal character, where the soft dignity of the woman blends with and tempers the severity of the queen who could restrain even Jupiter himself. When Goethe first saw this head he exclaimed: "It is like a verse of Homer!"

60. MELEAGER. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 6\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

The original of this fine heroic figure was found in Rome, and is supposed to be of the time of Hadrian, A. D. 76-136. Meleager was a famous hero of antiquity, and one of the chiefs of the Argonautic expedition. The hound and boar's head signify his great exploit of slaying a boar that ravaged his father's dominions. The left forearm was never restored.

61. BUST OF MENELAUS. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

The original of this grand bust, so full of martial character, was found at Hadrian's Villa Tivoli, and is commonly, but erroneously, known as Ajax. Visconti satisfactorily proved it to be Menelaus. Bas-reliefs of Hercules fighting with Centaurs are on the helmet.

62. BELVEDERE TORSO. $\frac{H.}{4 \text{ ft. } 1\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in the Vatican.

The original of this famous torso was found near the end of the 15th century, at Pompey's Theatre. It represents Hercules in repose, and from an inscription on its base it was made by Appollonius, son of Nestor, Athens. It was ever a favorite study with Michael Angelo, and doubtless the inspiring source of much of his grand modelling, and it is said that in his dim old age he was often seen tracing with trembling hands the mighty mass.

63. JASON. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{3 \text{ ft.}}$ Original, Marble, in the Louvre.

This statue has been called Mercury and Cincinnatus, but is now considered to represent the famous leader of the Argonauts, hurriedly tying on but one sandal in his haste to seek his uncle Pelias, usurper of his father's throne, and who had been warned by an oracle to beware of the "one-sandalled man."

The work is obviously of the same style of the Fighting Gladiator, showing similar muscular sparseness of form, small head, and short hair. It is of the Alexandrian or third era of Greek sculpture. It once stood in the Villa Negroni, was bought with the Germanicus by Louis XIV, and placed at Versailles.

64. IRIS. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 3 \text{ in.}}$ Original (Elgin) Marble, in the British Museum.

The original of this statue (by Phidias) of the Messenger of the Gods once stood in the east pediment of the Parthenon, at Athens, as announcing the birth of Minerva. Though mutilated by time and war, the observant student of Greek sculpture will see in these remains of its broad, massive treatment, a contrast with the greater grace and more elaborate detail of the succeeding third epoch, as shown in the Daughter of Niobe, by Scopas.

65. BUST OF PERICLES. Marble, in the British Museum.

Pericles was of noble birth, a man of letters, warrior, statesman, and liberal patron of art. Under his rule, Athens eclipsed all other cities of Greece by her achievements in arms, sculpture, architecture, and the drama.

His busts and statues always represented him with a helmet, owing to the odd shape of his head, which gained him from his enemies the nickname of "onion headed." Born 499-429 B. C.

66. BUST OF PERIANDER. Marble, in the British Museum.
One of the Seven Sages of Greece.

67. BUST OF JULIUS CÆSAR. Marble, in the British Museum.

Decision of character is in every line of this head of Rome's great Dictator, assassinated in the Senate House, B. C. 44, in his 56th year.

68. BOY EXTRACTING A THORN FROM HIS FOOT. H.
2 ft. 4½ in.
Original in Bronze. Capitol, Rome.
Said to have been found in the Tiber. Of the best period of Greek art.
69. HEAD OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT. Marble, in the British Museum.
70. HEAD OF DIOGENES. Marble, in the British Museum.
The famous Cynic philosopher died in his 90th year, fifth century B. C.
71. BUST OF DIONE. Marble, in the British Museum.
Daughter of Nereus and Doris, and mother of Venus. It is not known where and when the original was discovered. The head is considered of the finest period of art.
72. BUST OF CLYTIE. Marble, in the British Museum.
The artist is unknown. Clytie was enamored of Apollo, and followed him devotedly, like the sunflower, and this idea is represented in the leaves of that flower from which her bosom rises, while the delicate pensiveness of the head completes the sentiment.
73. BUST OF SEPTIMIUS SEVERUS. Marble, in the British Museum.
Emperor of Rome A. D. 193-211. He built the wall across Great Britain to repel the Caledonians.
74. BUST OF TRAJAN. Marble, in the British Museum.
Emperor of Rome A. D. 98-117, and celebrated for his virtuous and humane character, as well as for his military genius. The original of this bust was found in the Campagna of Rome in 1776.
75. BUST OF ISIS. Marble, in the British Museum.
The Egyptian goddess, with the lotus flower above her forehead, is here represented unveiled.
76. THE WRESTLERS. H.
3 ft. Marble, in Florence.
The original of this spirited group is attributed to Cephissodotus, of the School of Rhodes, 5th period of Greek art. Having been found near the Niobe group, it was thought by many to have formed a part of it. Viardot says of it: "The head of the vanquished, purely antique, is gloomy and distorted, expressing impotent fury, while the head of the conqueror seems full of the pride of triumph."
77. DIANA HUNTRESS. H.
6 ft. 6 in. Marble, in the Louvre.
Also called Diana of Versailles, whither it was brought from Italy, for Francis I. The goddess is represented as snatching from Hercules the miraculous deer with golden horns and brazen feet, which he had chased for a year. It is of the same style of art with the Belvedere Apollo, of which it is properly the mate, and is considered to have been executed in the first Christian century. There is a maidenly severity of aspect in the chaste goddess, as though, to use the words of Viardot, "she were more ready to punish Acteon than to awaken the beautiful sleeper of Mount Latmos"
78. AUGUSTUS CÆSAR. H.
6 ft. 10 in. Marble, in the Louvre.
The original of this noble robed statue is much worn, excepting the head, which bears a strong resemblance to the "Crowned Augustus," which see page 11.
79. HERMES AND DIONYSOS. H.
7 ft. 2 in. Original in marble. Praxiteles.
The original of this superb cast, now in Athens, Greece, was found by German explorers in Olympia in 1877. It is known to be by Praxiteles, on the authority of Pausanias, (2d century A. D.,) who saw and described it. It is considered equal at least, if not superior, to any statue of antiquity.

Jupiter, wooed by Semele, descends to her in thunder and lightning. Overcome with terror, she was consumed in the flames. In pity for her unborn child, he had it sewn up in his thigh until mature. After its birth he consigned it (Dionysos) to Mercury, who bore it tenderly to Ino, sister of Semele. Hermes, (Mercury,) with his left arm resting upon a tree trunk partly hidden by his mantle, supports the infant Dionysos, whose right hand rests upon the shoulder of his guardian. The right arm of Hermes is but a stump, much elevated, but its action when entire is unknown, though Hirschfield suggests that it held up a bunch of grapes. The attitude of the child appears as if he were eagerly grasping at something, and the pleased expression of Hermes seems to warrant the suggestion.

All below the knees of Hermes is lost, save one foot, (seen on the plinth behind the cast,) the finished modelling of which is superior to that of any other foot in the collection. The loss of the lower limbs is a serious one, and when we survey the noble and beautiful head, the manly chest, the loins and thighs, wherein are blended strength, lightness, and grace, we feel what a transcendent statue it must have been when entire. The features are notably unlike those of any other antique head, where rigid classic lines show little emotion. The brow is full and broad, and the nose and other upper features suggest a Washington-like mould, while on the mouth sits a gentle gracious smile towards Dionysos, more god-like than the expression of Silenus over his infant Bacchus, No. 26.

SIDE GALLERY, (MODERN.)

1. VENUS VICTRIX. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 11\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble. By John Gibson.

The calm self-possession in her victory of this Venus contrasts with the dainty, lively action of the same subject by Thorwaldsen.

John Gibson was born in 1790 and died at Rome in 1866. He boldly used color upon his marble statues, saying that "whatever the Greeks did was right." He made a statue of Queen Victoria in classical costume, with the diadem, sandals, and border of the drapery colored. The original in marble of this cast was also colored. The face and limbs were of flesh color, the drapery yellow, and the apple red.

2. VENUS. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 6\frac{3}{4} \text{ in.}}$ Marble, in Florence. By Canova.

It is but a modified copy of the Venus de Medici, with the addition of drapery, and the small difference that Canova's figure rests upon the right leg, and not upon the left, as does the great Medicean statue.

3. VENUS VICTRIX. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft.}}$ Marble. By B. Thorwaldsen.

There is but one opinion of its exquisite symmetry, purity, and grace. Thorwaldsen was born in Copenhagen in 1757 and died in 1844. His genius more than that of any other modern sculptor inclined to revive antique sculpture, and hence he has been called "a posthumous Greek."

4. CLYTIE. $\frac{H.}{4 \text{ ft. } 11\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Marble. W. H. Rinehart.

The original marble is in the Peabody Institute, Baltimore. It is the work of a sculptor who, from the humble position of a marble-cutter, rose to the highest rank as a sculptor. Matching, but not imitating, the pensive sweetness of the famous antique bust of Clytie, he has carried out the story of her ill-fated passion for Apollo in the drooping sadness of a delicate form, that puts this work of American genius not only in a proud position amid those of Thorwaldsen, Canova, and Gibson, but also of Greek sculpture.

Mr. Rinehart died at Rome, in 1874, aged 46.

5. SLEEPING CHILD. $\frac{L.}{2 \text{ ft. } 1 \text{ in.}}$ F. Pettrich.

GALLERY OF THE RENAISSANCE.

1. CAST FROM THE WEST BRONZE GATE OF THE BAPTISTERY AT FLORENCE.

By Lorenzo Ghiberti, 1381-1455.

This superb cast was brought from the South Kensington Museum, London, and consists of forty-six pieces.

Ghiberti was a goldsmith, and from the Goldsmiths' Guild arose the great sculptors in bronze. He appeared before the world in that era of the Renaissance when the exhumation of the great models of ancient art inspired the whole race of painters, sculptors, and architects. He was only twenty years old when he competed for the work of making the bronze door of the north portal of the Baptistery, and got the commission, though his competitors were the famous veteran sculptors of that time. His success with that gate, which took him twenty-one years to execute, (1424,) at once obtained for him the order for the west gate—the original of this cast, which was completed in 1447, and upon it his fame chiefly rests. The designs for his first gate were from the New Testament, and were dictated to him by the Consuls, but in his last and greatest work he was allowed to select his own designs from the Old Testament. Michael Angelo said they were "worthy of being the gates of Paradise." A farm and a seat in the Supreme Magistracy of Florence were voted to him as rewards for his genius. Ten square panels contain the designs from the Old Testament, each design illustrating three or four incidents, and are surrounded by narrower panels, some of them upright, with niches containing historic personages, prophets, sibyls, &c., in high relief, and enriched with birds, flowers, fruit, &c., delicately wrought.

The left highest panel shows the Creation of Adam and Eve, the Forbidden Fruit, and the Expulsion from Eden. On the right panel opposite are Offerings of Cain and Abel, Killing of Abel, Man's Labor, and Cain with His Maker.

The left panel below has the Ark after the Deluge, Noah's Sacrifice and Inebriation. On the right are the Sacrifice of Isaac, Servants at the foot of the Mount, and Abraham with the Three Angels.

The left central panel contains Jacob and Esau, and on the right Joseph and his Brethren, their Cruelty, their meeting in Egypt, the Cup in Benjamin's Sack, &c.

The left panel below the centre shows Moses Receiving the Law, and the People at the Foot of the Mount. On the right are Joshua before Jericho, and the Division of the Tribes.

The lowest panel on the left contains David and Goliath, and on the right Solomon and the Queen of Sheba.

Among the statuettes in the upright panels are Sampson with the Pillar, Joshua in Armor, Judith with the Head of Holofernes, Jephthah's Daughter. Among the heads are two on a line with the top of the second panel representing the artist Ghiberti, (the bald one on the right,) and Bartoluccio, his father-in-law.

The outer panels, bearing fruits and flowers, were finished by Ghiberti's son, the artist having died ere the completion of his work, at the age of seventy-four years—more than half of which was given to these two monuments of his genius that after four centuries remain unimpaired wonders of art.

Ghiberti boldly departed from all preceding rules that confined bas-relief to the strict laws of the plastic art, and introduced perspective and landscape. This point in his work has been condemned by many, and among them Flaxman, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and Westmacott; but such is the amazing relief and exquisite expression of distance in his groups, buildings, and landscape that such technical objections will find but little sympathy, and Dr. Lubke has well disposed of them in the following comment: "Ghiberti revolutionized plastic art by his love for the picturesque, which forbids the former to enter the lists of the sister arts; yet in the hands of a master sculpture never trespassed upon forbidden soil with such inimitable grace and fullness of beauty and life, that, much as we protest against the tendency, we are carried away by the charm of the whole."

The cast of this gate as it stands is 18 feet 2 inches high by 12 feet 6 inches wide—exclusive of the walnut frame, which makes it altogether 19 feet 7 inches high by 14 feet 6 inches wide.

- 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. BAS-RELIEFS OF NYMPHS OF THE FOUNTAIN OF THE INNOCENTS. From the originals, in marble, in the Louvre. By Jean Goujon. (1530-1572.)

Jean Goujon was the leader of the Renaissance of French sculpture, and by the graceful flowing lines of his forms, was called the Correggio of sculpture; though in the extreme slenderness of their proportions he inclined too much to the style introduced by Primaticcio. He was slain by a stray shot while at work on the scaffold at the Louvre, during the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day.

8. TRITON AND NEREID. 9. AMPHITRITE, WIFE OF NEPTUNE.
10. NYMPH OF THE SEA. Bas-reliefs, by J. Goujon. From the Fountain of the Innocents. Original, marble, in the Louvre.
11. THE FOUR EVANGELISTS. Bas-reliefs, by J. Goujon. 1541-44. Original, in marble, in the Louvre, from the Roodloft of St. Germain l'Auxerrois. The small panels represent Religion, Faith, and Strength.
12, 13, 14, 15. BAS-RELIEFS OF SEA-NYMPHS. Original, in marble, in the Louvre. By J. Goujon. Formerly in the Porte St. Antoine.
16. BAS-RELIEFS FROM THE TOMB OF CARDINAL AND CHANCELLOR DUPRAT. Original, in marble, in the Louvre. By J. Goujon.
17. BAS-RELIEF OF HISTORY RECORDING THE WORKS OF PRESIDENT J. A. DUTHOU, Counsellor and Historian. By François Anguier. 1553-1617. Original, in bronze, in the Louvre.

18. BAS-RELIEF OF VICTORY. By Jacquet. Original in the Louvre.
19. FLYING MERCURY. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 1 \text{ in.}}$ Original in bronze. Florence.

The original was executed by John, of Bologna, about 1560 A. D., and is in the Uffizi. In classic conception of the winged messenger of Jove bounding upward with airy grace, caduceus in hand, from the mouth of Æolus, this spirited figure would do honor to the genius of old Greece.

20. DAVID AND GOLIAH. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 1 \text{ in.}}$ Original in bronze. Florence.

A noble work by Donatello, the great Tuscan sculptor, now in the Uffizi. It represents the young victor nude, with an ivy-crowned shepherd's hat, standing with one foot on Goliath's head, which he has dis-severed with his enemy's sword held in his right hand. The winged helmet of Goliath bears in low relief a car of triumph drawn by children.

21. THE THREE GRACES OR CHARITIES. $\frac{H.}{6 \text{ ft. } 6 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{6 \text{ ft. } 4 \text{ in.}}$ Carved in marble, in the Louvre. By Germain Pilon. 1560.

This curious example of the Renaissance of French sculpture was executed for Catharine of Medici in memory of her husband, Henry II of France, whose heart was placed in the original urn, supported on the heads of the three female figures, standing back to back and with linked hands, upon a triangular pedestal of exquisite beauty. These figures represent Catharine herself, the Duchess d'Etampes, and Madame Villeroy, three of the fairest women of that time. This work is noted for the original treatment of the drapery, and was cut out of a single block of marble. The pedestal was made by a different hand, and bears on its three faces inscriptions in Latin, to the following effect :

"Here Catharine has deposited the heart of the king, her husband, wishing she could bury it in her own bosom."

"The united heart of both testifies before men enduring love—a subdued spirit before God."

"The Three Graces (or Charities) rightfully bear on their heads a heart once the seat of the graces (or charities)—a heart that aspired to the highest things."

This monument formerly stood in the Chapelle d'Orleans, Church of the Celestins.

22. COLOSSAL BUST OF DAVID. $\frac{H.}{2 \text{ ft. } 10 \text{ in.}}$ By Michael Angelo. 1504.

This grand cast is taken from the original colossal statue in marble, 19 feet high, in Florence, representing David about to hurl the stone at Goliath. The statue was cut out of one block of marble.

A wonderful blending of inspired heroism with the beauty of young manhood is given in the terrible frown, the dauntless determination of the compressed lips, and the swollen veins and muscles of the neck.

23, 24. THE PRISONERS OR SLAVES. $\frac{H.}{7 \text{ ft. } 3 \text{ in.}}$ Florence. Michael Angelo.

These powerful statues were designed for a grand monument to Pope Julius II, planned, but never executed, by M. Angelo. The artist gave them to a friend who had nursed him in illness, and he presented them to Francis I, who, in turn, gave them to the Constable Montmorency for his Chateau d'Ecouen. During the troubles of the Revolution in 1793, they were found in the stables of the Duc de Richelieu, and were bought for the Republic. They are now in the Louvre, and are the only great works of M. Angelo in France. They were taken to Florence in 1875 to swell the memorials of the sculptor's mighty genius at the centennial celebration of his birthday. No better examples exist of his power in depicting physical passion. The dignity of form and expression of drooping, slumberous suffering of one figure are in singular contrast with the contorted limbs and writhing, defiant air of the other; the unfinished head of which, showing the marks of the great master's chisel, illustrates the frequent fitful energy of his style.

25. CUPID. $\frac{H.}{4 \text{ ft. } 6 \text{ in.}}$ Marble. Michael Angelo.

The original is in the Kensington Museum, and was bought from the Campana collection. It is supposed to be one of his earliest works, executed soon after his first visit to Rome.

26. SINGING BOYS. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.}}$ $\frac{W.}{2 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}}$ Original in marble. Florence.

One of many alto-reliefs by Luca della Robbia (about 1440 A. D.) for the balustrade of an organ loft, but never set up. They are now in the Uffizi. This relief is considered a master-piece for grouping and natural expression.

27. SITTING STATUE OF LORENZO DE MEDICI. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 8 \text{ in.}}$ M. Angelo.

The original of this imposing figure, whose solemn, meditative air has given it the title of "Il Pensiero," is in the church of St. Lorenzo, Florence, with a similar statue of his brother, Giuliano, and erected by order of Pope Leo X. Below them, on the curved tops of their sarcophagi, recline the figures of Dawn and Twilight under Lorenzo, and of Day and Night under Giuliano. Reduced copies of these symbolic figures, Nos. 41 and 42, furnish an idea of the general form of the monuments.

28. HEAD OF THE STATUE OF GIULIANO DE MEDICI. $\frac{H.}{18 \text{ in.}}$ M. Angelo.

The noble grace of this uncovered head is in striking contrast with the mysterious awe of his brother's, overshadowed by the helmet.

29. MASK OF MOSES. H.
2 ft. 7 in. Marble. M. Angelo.

The original of the colossal seated statue of Moses is considered one of the sublimest of the sculptor's works, and was executed for the monument of Pope Julius II. Lubke says that in the intense energy of its expression the sculptor "does not represent the circumspect chief, the wise lawgiver, but the stormy zealot, dashing aside the tablets of the law, in furious anger at the idolatry of his people." For an explanation of the strange error of horns being attached to the head of Moses see the notice of Cabanel's "Death of Moses," No. 58 of the main gallery of pictures.

30. BAS-RELIEF OF AN ALTAR-PIECE. H. W.
4 ft. 3 3/4 in. 4 ft. 4 1/2 in. Mino da Fiesole, 1400-1486.

This fine bas relief in marble, in the Cathedral at Fiesole, Florence, represents the Virgin between St. Remigius and St. Leonhard, with the infant Jesus below, and St. John worshipping him. One of the saints directs the sitting figure, holding a crutch, to the Saviour also.

31. BUST OF BISHOP LIONARDI (SALUTATI). H.
22 in. Mino da Fiesole.

The Bishop was the friend of Pope Eugenius IV, and this bust, so full of strong character, is from the original marble monument in the Cathedral of Fiesole.

- 32, 33, 34, 35, 36. FIVE BASS-RELIEFS. H. W.
31 1/2 in. x 29 1/2 in. Benedetto da Maiano, 1442-1498.

These admirable reliefs, representing scenes in the life of St. Francis, are from the marble pulpit of the Church of Sante Croce, Florence.

37. HEAD OF ST. GEORGE. H.
20 in. Donatello, 1386-1468.

The marble statue of St. George, clad in armor, with cross-embazoned shield, stands in an external niche of Or San Michele, Florence, and is considered a masterpiece of knightly grace and dignity.

- 38, 39, 40. BUSTS OF MATTEO PALMIERI, FILIPPO STROZZI, and PIETRO MELLINI. Originals in marble in Florence, by Benedetto da Maiano.

3. THE HILDESHEIM TREASURES. By Christoffe & Co., Paris.

Electrotype reproductions of ancient vessels found near the remains of a Roman camp, near Hildesheim, Hanover.

On the 17th of October, 1868, some soldiers, while digging near their camp on the slope of Galgen, overlooking that town, found, at the depth of ten feet, some bits of metal that proved to be silver. Further search discovered two large bell-shaped vases or bowls, inverted, under which were other vessels and fragments. They were strangely heaped together; the feet and handles were detached from the vessels to which they belonged, and many were much corroded by the infiltration of a wet soil.

They were placed in the hands of an expert, who succeeded in rejoining the loose feet and handles. Being subsequently taken to the Royal Museum at Berlin, they were reproduced in electrotype by German artists, but in a style far inferior to these by Christoffe & Co. Their discovery made a great sensation, and it was at first supposed that the original Treasures were part of the dinner service of Varus, the Roman general, who was defeated by the Germans, under Arminius, near Hildesheim, in the year A. D. 9, but the style of some of the pieces was so evidently of a later date that the idea is now abandoned. The design and workmanship of most of them certainly show their extreme antiquity; such as the four patera or bowls, containing figures in such high relief, two of which—No. 3, said to be Deus Lunus, with a Phrygian cap, with a crescent behind him, and No. 4, a female with a mural crown and shield, said to be Cybele, or the Earth—are apparently of an Oriental character. On the other hand, the high conical cup, No. 5, is pronounced by M. A. Darcel, author of a pamphlet accompanying these Treasures, to be of a much later date, from the rude shape of the cup and semi-barbarous style of its chasings, so unlike the classical forms and decorations of the accompanying drinking cups.

It is now believed these "Treasures" were the buried spoils of a robber of later times, and not the collection of some rightful owner who had hidden them in a time of invasion.

Those who wish to know more of these Treasures can find their character discussed at length in the pamphlet by M. A. Darcel, Paris.

12. BUST OF THE LATE COMMODORE MORRIS, U. S. N. King. Boston.

13. BUST OF EX-VICE-PRESIDENT JOHN C. BRECKENRIDGE.

By H. K. Brown. 18—. Presented by Geo. Taylor, Esq.

14. MARBLE STATUETTE OF ECHO. $2\frac{1}{2}$ ft. 10 in. Larkin G. Meade.

Mr. Meade is a native of Vermont, and his first effort in sculpture was an angel made of snow, that made quite a sensation, and led to his being befriended by Mr. Longworth, of Cincinnati. He afterwards went to Europe, and his first work was this statuette of "Echo."

15. BUST OF ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT.

Christian Rauch. Berlin. 1777-1857.

This fine work was executed for Mr. Corcoran at the particular request of Humboldt. Rauch was one of the most eminent sculptors of his time. His greatest work is the statue of Frederick the Great, at Berlin.

16. PROMETHEUS VASE. (Majolica.) By Minton. England.

This superb turquoise vase, four feet high, represents the old Greek myth of Prometheus chained to a rock, with a black eagle, with distended wings, feeding upon his never-dying vitals, as a punishment for stealing fire from Heaven. Below him, on the swell of the vase, recline four figures, with manacled feet, and hands bound with ropes that extend to the handles of the vase, over which hang also the iron chain. The base is encircled with a wreath of laurel, round which are twisted four serpents, thus typifying throughout the gnawing cares of the soul lighted by genius caught from heaven, and tormented by the worm creeping among his laurels.

17^a, 17^b. MAJOLICA VASES, PAIR OF, with Japanese decorations.

These vases, over four feet high, were made by Deck, of Paris, and are modern imitations of the pottery of the Moors, whose principal factory was in the Island of Majorca—in the Tuscan dialect, Majolica; hence the name of the ware. It is simply earthenware with a strong, lustrous glaze, that remained a secret with the Moors until the Italians discovered it, and then the town of Faenza, in Italy, became famous for its ware. Hence the name Faience was given to it, and which is essentially the same as Majolica. The great artists of that era, even Raphael himself, often furnished designs for it.

18, 19. TWO VASES OF SÈVRES PORCELAIN, that contrast the elegance of the modern French ware with the imitations of the semi-barbarous style of Moorish pottery.

20, 21. TWO PLAQUES OF STONE-PORCELAIN, into which are burnt paintings of Poultry and Fish, by Schopin, of Paris.

The process of baking these pictures is difficult and hazardous. The slightest mistake in the temperature in cooling the slabs is apt to ruin the work. It often happens that forty of them are spoilt before a successful picture is secured.

22. BRONZES.

By Antoine Louis Barye, Paris.

This collection, by the late famous sculptor and professor of animal drawing in the Jardin des Plantes, Paris, is the largest one to be found, even in Europe. The dates on some of them will show how unimpaired was his skill at an advanced age. He was born in 1796, and died on the 25th of June, 1875. He was first an engraver, next a goldsmith, and finally a sculptor, and he successively studied under Fourier, Bosio, and Le Gros. He first exhibited in 1827. So free from pride was his nature, that he often personally delivered to his patrons their purchases; a habit that caused a wrong belief that his poverty forced him to hawk his works about the streets in a basket. In 1848 he was appointed Keeper and Director of the Modelling Department of the Louvre, and in 1851 attained the post in the Jardin des Plantes held by him until his death. This position gave him his astonishing knowledge of the forms and habits, quiescent and ferocious, of the various animals there. Nor was his genius confined to them. The superb group of Roger and Angelique, (the old story of Perseus and Andromeda in the garb of a mediæval ballad,) the groups of Theseus slaying the Centaur and Minotaur, show his classical taste. His horses are remarkable for their modelling and varied action; and though perhaps over-fond of showing the ferocious instincts of the brute creation, their gentler moods are quite as successfully represented. We turn from the furious leap of the Lion, the spring of the Hound, the deep-buried bite of the Tiger, and the terrible coil of the Serpent, and see the versatility of his genius in the quiet beauty of his groups of Deer, the timid, shrinking Gazelle, the grim dignity of his sitting Lion, the knightly air of his Gaston de Foix, and the ambling grace of his Amazon.

The Lion of the Tuileries, the Lion of the Column of July, and his Theseus and Centaur are considered his great master-pieces.

38. COLUMN OF THE PLACE VENDOME, Paris. 5 ft. 3 in.

Original was erected in 1806-10, by Napoleon I, in honor of his German campaign in 1805, modelled after Trajan's Column, Rome, and made of 1,200 pieces of Austrian and Russian cannon taken in that campaign. Its height was 135 feet, the shaft, covered with 276 bronze plates, spirally arranged, to a length of 840 feet, representing the victories of the French army, and containing 2,000 figures 3 feet high. It was the work of 31 sculptors. The original statue, by Chaudet, 11 feet high, represented the Emperor in a Roman mantle. The whole work cost $300,000. In 1814 the royalists removed the statue, had it melted down, and converted into the horse of the statue of Henry IV on the Pont Neuf. A flagstaff and fleur de lis took its place. These in turn were removed by Louis Philippe in 1833, and a statue of Napoleon, by Seurre, in the familiar cocked hat and overcoat, set up. In 1863 Napoleon III removed this statue to Courbevoie, and substituted a fac simile of the original one. Before the Germans entered Paris the military statue was removed from Courbevoie and hidden in the bottom of the Seine. The Commune pulled down the whole column, except its base. It was rebuilt in 1874 and the broken statue repaired and restored; but it has been again superseded by the cocked hat and overcoat, since fished up from the Seine. The changeable fortunes of this column and its statue seem to have been foreshadowed in the fact that part of its base formed the pedestal of the statue of Louis XIV, erected in 1699, and pulled down by the mob in the Revolution of 1792.

A classical group, treated with immense power. The Centaurs were a savage tribe of Thessaly, and being great horsemen, the Greeks fancied them to be half man and half horse. To a feast, in honor of his marriage, Perithous, king of the Lapithæ, invited the Centaurs and some of the gods; but Mars, not being invited, revenged the slight by filling Eurythion, the Centaur, with wine and love for the bride. Theseus resented the insult by putting Eurythion to death, and in the fierce war that followed, the Centaurs were vanquished by Theseus and his allies.

47. MONUMENT TO FREDERICK II, (the Great,) OF PRUSSIA.
 $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}}$ $\frac{\text{With Pedestal,}}{7 \text{ ft. } 7 \text{ in.}}$
A superb bronzed reduction of the original bronze work in Berlin, by Christian Rauch, 1851, considered one of the noblest monuments ever erected. The person of the king is given with all his peculiarities, and admirably dominates the various masses and details of the composition. The reliefs of the upper section represent epochs in his life: 1. His birth; 2. Education; 3. Minerva presenting a sword; 4. After the battle of Kolin; 5. Love of Art; 6. Taste for music; 7. Promotion of Commerce; 8. Apotheosis. At the corners are figures of Moderation, Justice, Wisdom, and Strength. At the corners of the central section are equestrian statuettes of Prince Henry of Prussia, Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, Gen. Ziethen, and Gen. Seydlitz. The lower section bears the names of many eminent generals. Height of the original monument, 40 feet. From the Centennial Exhibition. Purchased by Mr. Corcoran.
48. BRONZED REDUCTION OF THE MONUMENT OF THE GREAT ELECTOR, (on a rotary column.) By A. Schlutter. Berlin, 1703.
 $\frac{\text{Height of Monument,}}{26 \text{ in.}}$ $\frac{\text{With Pedestal,}}{6 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}}$
The figures at the corners below represent slaves. From the Centennial Exhibition. Purchased by Mr. Corcoran.
- 49, 50. STATUETTES OF THE EMPEROR FREDERICK WILLIAM AND CROWN PRINCE OF GERMANY. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft.}}$
From the Centennial Exhibition. Purchased by Mr. Corcoran.
51. BRONZE JAPANESE YOSHITARE VASE. $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 1\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{26 \text{ in.}}$ Cent'l Exhib.
This vase takes its distinctive title from its bass-reliefs of scenes in the life of Japan's hero, Yoshitane. On one side he is seen as a boy secluded in a ravine studying wisdom and war from old Saradahiko, chief spirit of the mountain. On the other side, after having become a great general, he attempts, disguised as a travelling priest, with his servant, to enter the territory of his jealous brother. At the guard-house he is questioned by the suspicious official. Feigning rustic speech, he makes his servant knock him (Yoshitane) down and pound him, which so pleases the guard that they are allowed to pass in. Within this section of the vase is a brazen vessel for fire, and the perforated upper section is a censer, surmounted by the god Hohodermi, who, descending into Japan standing on a dragon, introduced letters and writing. See "The Mikado's Empire," by Prof. W. E. Griffas.

The vase represents rocks, trees, and cascades, with birds, whose forms and plumage are wrought in a style equal to European art.

52. CASE OF JAPANESE ARTICLES AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, the latter presented by the Kiri Koshō Company, of Japan.

1. Gold lacquered glove-box. 2. Music-stand. 3. Black lacquered box, for holding India ink, palette, knife, &c. 4. Black lacquered box. 5. Harp. 6. Chess-board. 7. Set of checkers. 8, 9. Flutes. 10, 11. Flag-geoltes. 12, 13, 14, 15. Drums. 16. Violin. 17. Guitar. 18. Back-gammon-board. 19. Checker-board. 20. Large Drum.

53. LARGE "ARITA" PORCELAIN JAPANESE VASE, (lacquered.) $\frac{H.}{7\text{ ft.}}$ $\frac{W.}{2\frac{1}{2}\text{ ft.}}$. Centennial Exhibition. Purchased by Mr. Corcoran. This vase, like those in the Vestibule, is of a size and style seldom made.

54. HALF SIZE (3 FEET) CORINTHIAN BRONZE STATUETTE OF AUGUSTUS CÆSAR, IN MILITARY DRESS.

This magnificent statuette is by Boschetti. The original, in marble, was discovered in Rome in 1863, and is considered one of the finest statues of antiquity. It represents Augustus in his 45th year. The resemblance of the features to those of the "Crowned Augustus" bust and the Robed Augustus is obvious.

55, 56, 57. CHINESE VASES AND SQUARE TABLE CLOISONNÉ, 300 YEARS OLD.

These are rare examples of the skill of the Chinese, who originated this style of working in metal. Cloisonné is taken from the word cloison, or cell. When a design was made on metal, brass wire was attached and soldered to the lines of the figure, and soldered to the metal plate. Into the cloisons or cells, between the wire, was placed the enamel of various hues. A close inspection of these articles will show the amount of skill and labor bestowed in this art, in which the Chinese and Japanese have taught Europe. From the Centennial Exhibition.

58. LARGE JAPANESE PORCELAIN BOWL, decorated, 3 feet in diameter, 7 inches in depth. Centennial Exhibition.

59. COLOSSAL HEAD OF NAPOLEON I. Marble. $\frac{H.}{28\text{ in.}}$. By A. Canova. A copy by Canova of the head of the colossal statue of Napoleon I, which he modelled from the Emperor at Paris, in 1805.

Antonio Canova was born in Passagno, Italy, in 1757, and died in 1822. He displayed his genius at an early age. He made his first statue, Orpheus, when in his nineteenth year, and four years after he astonished the world by his "Theseus and Minotaur." Success and riches followed his subsequent works, embracing almost every kind of subject. Among them was a sitting statue of Washington, for the State of North Carolina. He had great simplicity of character, and towards the close of his life his chisel was devoted to religious subjects.

60. BUST OF ALSACE. Original in Bronze. Gregoire. 187-.

This reduced cast is to be found everywhere in France, from its forcible personation of the province taken from that country by Germany.

61. JAGUAR DEVOURING A HARE. Bronze. $\frac{H}{16 \text{ in.}} \times 3 \text{ ft. } \frac{L}{2 \text{ in.}}$. By A. L. Barye.

62. ANTIQUE HEAD OF CERES. In marble. $\frac{H}{18 \frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$.

The sculptor of this fine work and its history are unknown beyond the fact that it once belonged to the National Institute, was afterwards transferred to the Smithsonian Institution, and by the latter deposited in this Gallery of Art. The features are of a pure classic mould, and their benignant expression, with the crown of bearded wheat, well represent the goddess of grain and harvests.

63. THE MILTON SHIELD. Electrotype reproduction. By Elkington.

The original was designed and wrought in silver and steel repoussé, by M. Morel Ladeuil, England, for the Paris Exposition of 1867. The British Government bought it for the Kensington Museum for \$15,000. It represents scenes from Paradise Lost. In the centre Raphael rehearses to Adam and Eve, seated in the leafy bowers of Eden, the story of the war in Heaven and defeat of the rebel angels. On the left the loyal host is rushing to attack, while on the right the vanquished rebels are "hurled headlong flaming" to perdition. Below these, Michael, with uplifted sword, tramples upon the prostrate body of the Dragon, and at the bottom are the repulsive forms of Sin and Death. The signs of the zodiac indicate the rolling year, and over all soar angelic shapes toward the cherub-circled emblem of Light and Life. Oval. $\frac{H}{2 \text{ ft. } 10 \text{ in.}}$. Width, 2 ft. 2 in.

64. THE POMPEIAN TOILET. Electrotyped. By Elkington.

From the original work, designed and hammered out (repoussé) in silver, with damascened tracery in gold and silver, by M. Ladeuil, who was two years engaged in its execution with his own hand, for the Centennial Exhibition. It was valued at $7,500. For classical conception and exquisite workmanship, it is pronounced unrivalled. In a court surrounded by garlanded Ionic columns, vases of flowers, &c., a Pompeian lady, just from the bath, reclines demi-nude on her couch, while her handmaidens perform her toilet. One ties on her sandal, another binds her locks with a chain, and a third stands ready with a robe to shroud the still unveiled charms of her mistress, who smilingly surveys herself in a metal mirror. Besides the general grace of forms, the faces are full of expression. Circular. W., 20 in.

65. BUST OF WASHINGTON. Bronze. By Clark Mills. 1849.

From Houdon's original bust in plaster, 1785. Presented by Mr. Mills.

66. BUST OF HENRY CLAY. In marble. By Joel T. Hart.

Considered the standard bust of the great orator and statesman.

67. MARBLE BASS-RELIEF OF A BACCHANTE. Circular. Dia. $21 \frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}$

From the Smithsonian Institution. History unknown. Said to have been found in Pompeii.

68. BUST OF THE LATE DR. J. C. HALL. Bronze. By H. K. B. Brown. 1880.

69. BUST OF THE LATE WM. J. STONE. Marble. Hiram Powers.

Presented by Mrs. E. J. Stone.

70. BRONZE STATUETTE OF A COW. $\frac{H}{9 \text{ in.}} \times 14 \frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}$. $\frac{L}{14 \frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$. H. K. Bush Brown. 1883.

SECOND FLOOR.

1. COLOSSAL BUST OF LUCIUS VERUS. $\frac{H}{2 \text{ ft. } 10 \text{ in.}}$. Marble, in Louvre.

From the original found in Roma Vecchia. Lucius Verus was the unworthy son-in-law of the "good Aurelius," and shared the throne of Rome from 161 A. D. to 169. He was wasteful and profligate. He fed his horse on almonds, clothed him in royal purple, and had a gold statue of him made.

2. COLOSSAL BUST OF MARCUS AURELIUS. $\frac{H}{35 \frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$. Marble. Villa Borghese.

The "good Aurelius" was born 121 A. D., and reigned from 161 to 180 A. D.

"Oh, thou, by whose expressive art,
Her perfect image Nature sees,
In union with the Graces start,
And sweeter by reflection pleas!

On whose creative hand the hues,
Fresh from yon orient rainbow, shine;
I bless thee, Promethean Muse,
And hail thee, Brightest of the Nine!"

—THOMAS CAMPBELL.

1. PORTRAIT OF WILLIAM W. CORCORAN, Esq. H. 8 ft. 2 in. W. 5 ft. 10 in.
By Charles L. Elliott. 1867.

The artist of this magnificent work was born in 1812, and after studying his art in New York city, returned to practise portrait painting in the interior of that State. Soon after, he got possession of a head painted by Gilbert Stuart, which first opened his eyes to the dignity and splendor of true portraiture, and the constant study of which doubtless placed his fame alongside of that of Stuart himself. He died in 1868.

- 2, 3. THE DEPARTURE AND THE RETURN. H. 35 in. W. 44 in.
By Thomas Cole. 1837.

These pictures illustrate Cole's peculiar genius, in associating human incident with noble forms of scenery. In the first, a cavalcade of knights issue from an imposing castle on a bright summer morning on a warlike expedition. Hope and victory seem to animate them as they follow their leader mounted upon a white steed, in spite of the warning of a holy palmer, who waves a palm branch before them. Such is the Departure. The other picture shows the sad Return. At the close of an autumn day we see the wounded gay leader of the morning stretched upon a litter borne by some foot soldiers to an abbey, whence issue some monks to meet them, only one drooping cavalier following the riderless horse. The palmer is there again, but now raises his hands in pity.

Thomas Cole was born in England in 1801, and came to this country when young. His tastes and professional skill were finely cultured by two tours in Europe, but he ever preferred the scenery of the New World — on one occasion writing that "neither the Alps, Appenines, nor Ætna itself, have dimmed in my eyes the beauty of the Catskills." Among his beloved hills he died, in his forty-eighth year. The moral and religious bent of his mind was displayed in the series of pictures illustrating "The Course of Empire" and a "Voyage of Life;" and he died while at work upon his "Pilgrim Entering Heaven." His immediate friends were men of the highest moral culture and intellectual distinction.

4. THE WATERING PLACE. H. 3 ft. 4½ in. W. 5 ft. 8 in. By Adolphe Schreyer.

The artist of this picture is famed for the spirited action he gives to his horses in a cavalry charge, or in the furious gallop of a storm-caught wagon team; but here we see a new phase of his power in the strife of rough, worn farm horses over a water-trough. The scene is supposed to be in Hungary, and shows Schreyer's peculiar broad, vigorous handling and vivid force of light.

5. NEDJMA—ODALISQUE. H. 3 ft. 7 in. W. 5 ft. By G. C. St. Pierre. 1874.

The high reputation of the artist is shown in the words, "Exempt from examination," on the frame, as it was placed there when admitted to the Paris Exposition, 1874, in the catalogue of which it appears as No. 1628. This compliment is always paid to artists of established fame, and well does this picture support the honor. In rich transparency and harmony of color throughout it seems perfect. The flesh tints are nature's own, and the texture and surface of the various stuffs and other accessories are given with the highest finish.

6. EDGE OF THE FOREST. $\frac{H.}{6\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft. } 4 \text{ in.}}$ By A. B. Durand. 1871.

A fine example of this veteran landscapist, the last of the trio that headed that branch of art twenty-five years ago—Cole and Doughty being his peers. Having neither the epic style of Cole, nor the poetic fancy and pastoral softness of Doughty, he equalled both in representing pure nature and his close study of her subtler details. His rocks, and particularly his trees, are always rendered with a characterization that leaves no doubt of their kind. From such elements as are combined in this picture—a simple outlook across the Hudson from the skirt of a forest—he gives a picture full of feeling, of power, and of nature.

Mr. Durand was born in 1796, and enjoys an honored old age, being still able to use his pencil. In early life he learned the art of engraving, and soon distinguished himself by his skill. His first work was on Trumbull's Declaration of Independence. His engraving of Vanderlyn's "Ariadne Sleeping" gained him an European reputation. From this art he acquired the fine drawing shown in his pictures. He next took up painting, and portraits formed his first essays. Subjects of genre next occupied him, but finally his genius found its true field in landscape, with which his name and fame are mostly identified. Mr. Durand was for many years president of the National Academy of Design.

7. THE VESTAL TUCCIA. $\frac{H.}{4\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.}} \times \frac{W.}{8 \text{ ft. } 2\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ By Hector Leroux. 1874.

This picture carried off a second-class gold medal at the Paris Exposition of 1874—on the catalogue No. 1194. The Vestal Tuccia, charged with want of chastity, stands on the brink of the Tiber with a sieve, which she raises above her head with both hands, and thus prays to Vesta: "Oh, powerful Goddess, if I have always approached thy altar with pure hands, allow me to fill this sieve with the water of the Tiber, and carry it into thy Temple!" In fine harmony with this incident, the artist has employed purity of design and cool, chaste coloring. The shores and wharves of the Tiber are given with strict local truth. The whole interest converges upon the form of Tuccia, while distant masses of the people, a near group of Vestals, and a solitary fisher-boy in the foreground, watch her in eager expectation of the issue of the miraculous test.

8. EDICT OF WILLIAM THE TESTY. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 6\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft. } 6\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ G. H. Boughton. 1877.

Illustrates the following passage in Irving's "Knickerbocker's History of New York," Chap. 8:

"Finally he issued an edict prohibiting the smoking of tobacco throughout New Netherlands. * * * The immediate effect of it was a popular commotion. A vast multitude armed with pipes and tobacco boxes, and an immense supply of ammunition, sat themselves down before the Governor's house, and fell to smoking with tremendous violence. The testy William issued forth like a wrathful spider, demanding the reason of this lawless fumigation. The sturdy rioters replied by lolling back in their seats, and puffing away with redoubled fury."

The humor of Irving is well conveyed by the artist's treatment of a subject which, though essentially farcical, is free from buffoonery, and given with a solemn, Dutch gravity irresistibly droll. The "rioters" look calmly at the irate Governor, threatening with uplifted cane. His angry face and the vinegar aspect of his dame are in laughable contrast to the imperturbable rebels sending out defiant streams of smoke. Most conspicuous among them are the trumpeter, Antony Von Corlaer, in regimentals of scarlet and gold lace; the burly form of Brinkerhoff, (hero of the clam and onion war against the Yankees,) with thumbs in his belt; the stiff, upright figures of two puritans in dark dress and conical hats, and a sturdy craftsman seated on an inverted basket, with face turned up to the Governor, as though saying, "Well, what are you going to do about it?" Beyond this group is a swarm of Dutch maidens and lads, the latter hurrying to the front with fresh pipes, and back open is the open street of the tobacco-shops, where some villagers in baggy breeches buy more "ammunition."

In addition to its harmony of color and transparency of shadow, there is a charming airy luminousness resting over the picture, as though it were really an out-door scene.

The picture was painted to order for this Gallery.

9. THE DROVE AT THE FORD. $\frac{H.}{4\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.}} \times \frac{W.}{3 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}}$ By James M. Hart. 1874.

Considered the finest picture ever painted by Mr. Hart. The scene is such as every ramblor along a wood-stream has met with, and therefore it steals over us with all the charm of a personal reminiscence. At the close of day the drove is leaving the dusty road to cross a cool, shadowy stream, over-arched by trees. The leading animals and nearer trees of this picture are all painted from nature.

James Hart is one of two brothers, born in Scotland, and coming to this country at an early age, were both apprenticed to a coach painter, and both soon took up landscape painting. James went to Dusseldorf in 1851, and, after a year's study, returned home, and is now successfully following his profession in New York city. He gives a special interest to his landscapes by the introduction of animals.

10. SHEPHERD AND SHEEP. $\frac{H.}{34 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{49 \text{ in.}}$ By Robbe.

11. LANDSCAPE. Companion to the above. $\frac{H.}{34 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{49 \text{ in.}}$ By Robbe.

12. THE AMAZON AND HER CHILDREN. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}}$ By E. Leutze. 1851.

This classical work is colored much in Leutze's early style, which was warm and florid—unlike his later manner, acquired at Dusseldorf, as may be seen by comparing "The Amazon" with his "Cromwell and Milton."

13. IDEAL FEMALE HEAD. $\frac{H.}{30 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{25 \text{ in.}}$ Thomas Sully.

14. PADDY'S MARK. $\frac{H.}{24 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{32 \text{ in.}}$ By Erskine Nicol, A. R. A.

A brilliant specimen of genre of the British school, representing an Irish farmer about to put his mark to a lease, while he looks up with hesitating inquiry into the bland face of the attorney or steward, whose smooth manner assures Paddy that it is all right. The incident is admirably told, and every part of the work painted with great force and clearness.

15. RUINS OF THE PARTHENON. $\frac{H.}{28 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{52 \text{ in.}}$ By Sanford R. Gifford. 1880.

This classical work was the most important executed by the artist within a few months of his death in August, 1880. It displays the same skill in architectural accuracy, in fine color, and sympathy with the associations of this noblest faue of ancient Greece, that mark his representations of the sublime or beautiful landscapes of America and Europe. The subject is treated quietly, with no scenic appeals of form or effect. The calmest of skies broods over the distant mountains, "the tender azure of the unruffled deep," and the cream-colored ruins; blending beauty with solitude and desolation that makes us feel, "'Tis Greece, but living Greece no more!"

The view looks south from the Acropolis over the head of the Saronic Gulf. The ruins of one side of the Parthenon is on the left, and on the right is a portion of the Erechtheum, with its portico supported by the graceful forms of the Caryatids. The high square red tower near it is considered to be one of the numerous signal-towers built on the shores of the Levant by the Venetians or Genoese, before Athens was held by the Turks.

Mr. Gifford was born in New York State in 1823. He first went to Europe in 1855, and afterwards, in 1868, he extended his tour to the East; on each visit remaining two years. In 1861 and 1862-3, he was a private in the famous Seventh Regiment of New York, while stationed at Washington and Baltimore.

17. MERCY'S DREAM. $\frac{H.}{7 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft. } 9 \text{ in.}}$ By D. Huntington. 1850.

The scene which this picture illustrates is from Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, and is as follows: "A sweet dream it was. * * * Methought I looked up and saw one coming with wings towards me. So he came directly to me, and said, 'Mercy, what aileth thee?' Now, when he had heard me make my complaint, he said, 'Peace be to thee!' He also wiped my eyes with his handkerchief, and clad me in silver and gold. He put a chain about my neck, and ear-rings in my ears, and a beautiful crown upon my head."

This picture is an improved duplicate of the one owned by Mr. Carey, of Philadelphia, and has been engraved for the American Art Union. It made a great impression when first exhibited, being one of the first great pictures of its class painted by American artists, and it still justly holds a high position by the spiritual nobleness of the subject, and the style of its execution. The form of the angel is considered unsurpassed for buoyant grace and ethereal aspect, while its exquisite tints, play of light, and the lustrous sheen of the wings, are notable examples of that strong point, color, in the American school of painting.

Mr. Huntington's pencil has embraced every branch of his art, being also distinguished in portraiture and landscape. He was born in 1816, studied his art in Italy, and, after a long career of success and honor, is now president of the Academy of Design.

18. SCENERY OF THE MAGDALENA RIVER, GRANADA. H. 26 in. W. 36 in.
By Frederick E. Church. 1854.

This picture is by the painter of the "Heart of the Andes," and is his first landscape of South American scenery, painted after his return to New York from that region, for the late Abraham Cozzens. Perfect as a composition, it has Mr. Church's well-known truth of local color, and the foreground is worked up with the delicate detail and characterization of foliage that distinguishes all his works.

Mr. Church was born in Hartford, in 1826. He studied under Cole, and at twenty-four was at the head of his profession. For awhile he adopted the epic style of subjects his master loved to paint, but soon settled down into the representation of pure nature. After painting the most striking scenery of his native land, he visited South America, and thence brought materials for his greatest work, the "Heart of the Andes." He afterwards sought new trophies in the region of icebergs. Having exhausted all the material of the Western Continent, he visited Europe, Egypt, and Palestine. The Orient supplied him with new laurels, showing that his versatile genius could grapple with and master the distinguishing and opposite traits of the scenery of all lands. It is a general belief that no artist's powers can be fully developed until he visits Italy; but Church had attained the full maturity of his genius and skill long before he went to Europe.

19. THE YOUNG SAVOYARD MUSICIAN. H. 36 in. W. 24 in. By A. Collette. 1873.

An attractive work in monochrome. Its grave tone of color is in fine harmony with the subject, and the pensive beauty of the face of the young violinist. The picture is from the Paris Exposition of 1873.

20. NIGHT. H. 7 ft. W. 4 ft. 4 in. By A. Rebouet, Paris. 1873.

This personation of the sable goddess descending on the back of an owl, and dropping from her right hand poppies, to "seal the eyes of slumbering mortals," is by a modern French artist, and was in the Vienna Exposition of 1873.

21. CÆSAR DEAD. H. 7 ft. 2 in. W. 10 ft. 5 in. By Jean Leon Gerome.

"But yesterday the word of Cæsar might
Have stood against the world; now lies he there,
And none so poor as do him reverence!"

Gerome stands in the front rank of the painters of France, is a pupil of Delaroche, and member of the French Institute. His style is of the realistic, dramatic school, and his works show the profound study, knowledge of form, perspective and color, that attest the great master. This picture is supposed to be the careful study of Cæsar Dead, which he subsequently extended and used in his more elaborate picture of the Death of Cæsar, (since photographed,) where the conspirators are represented retiring from their bloody work, and the interior of the Senate Hall is shown with imposing rows of columns, desks, and other accessories. Many, however, think that in this picture "the moral's truth tells simpler so." The transitoriness of human greatness is shown in the body of the world's late master lying stretched alone in the gloomy desolateness of the Senate Hall—all accessories kept out of sight, save the fallen curule chair, the base of Pompey's statue, and the stony stare of horror from the Medusa in the pavement, dabbled with the bloody foot-prints of the vanished conspirators.

"O mighty Cæsar! dost thou lie so low?

Are all thy conquests, glories, triumphs, spoils,

Shrunk to this little measure?"

22. WINTER SCENE. $\frac{H.}{36 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{50 \text{ in.}}$ By Regis Gignoux. 1850.

A French artist, who, after a successful career in New York as a painter of American landscape, returned to his native country.

23. ON THE COAST OF NEW JERSEY. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 4 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{6 \text{ ft.}}$ W. T. Richards. 1883.

It is hardly necessary to point out the merits of this noble American picture by a native artist. Its materials, so simple in form, so natural in color, its marvellously-expressed motion and exquisite finish, wherein are no unmeaning splashes of paint, all attest the genius that could fill the subject with a breadth and feeling that lap the senses in repose, as though through a window the sea itself, with its music and its motion, was spread before us. On a plain bit of sandy shore roll in the moderate waves of old ocean, that stretches afar in a wide horizon, its expanse broken into masses by the light breaking through rifts of a cloudy sky, brightening the horizon with a ridge of silver, and with soft, shimmering rays playing upon the trailing foam of the recoiling waves. Here is no need to force effect by picturesque logs, rocks, or human figures. A gull or two careering over the waves, and the sheen of a schooner's sails on the horizon, only serve to deepen the sense of solitude and of vastness.

The picture was painted to order for this gallery. Mr. Richards for some years devoted his art to landscape and genre, but he has since found that his true "home is on the deep."

24. CATTLE ON THE SEA SHORE, NEAR SCHEVENINGEN, HOLLAND. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 6 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft. } 4 \text{ in.}}$
R. Burnier. 1881.

Here is a coast scene of a different type—a group of cows standing on the shore, near the famous watering-place. They have evidently "fed fat" their love for their juicy native pastures, and now lounge and doze with Dutch gravity along the shore that runs off imperceptibly into the calm, slumbrous sea. Beyond them are the idle sail of a stranded vessel and a young girl watching her charge. The sky, sea, cows—all things seem hushed in an afternoon repose.

Burnier is a native of Dusseldorf, and this work won a gold medal at the Brussels Exhibition of 1881.

25. AUTUMN SCENE ON THE HUDSON. $\frac{H.}{34 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{48 \text{ in.}}$ Thomas Doughty. 1850.

Thirty years ago Doughty divided the honors with Cole as the leading landscape painters of America. He was unrivalled in the exquisite tenderness of his style and color. His landscapes steal over and soothe the heart, as in this scene, whose soft hues and hazy breath contrast strikingly with the sharp, forcible drawing and epic style of Cole's "Departure and Return."

Doughty was born in Philadelphia in 1793, and died in 1856. He worked as a tanner until thirty years old, and then, after only one quarter's lessons in India-ink drawing, took up landscape painting as his profession. He made the tour of Europe in 1836. Skilful as he was in autumnal effects, he was the first American landscapist that adopted a grey, silvery tone in his general treatment of scenery. The Annals of forty years ago are filled with engravings from his works, that show the poetical feeling of his style. His latter years were clouded by poverty and neglect.

26. SEAPORT—STORM EFFECT. $\frac{H.}{29 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{36 \text{ in.}}$ Attributed to Joseph Vernet.

27. ADORATION OF THE SHEPHERDS. $\frac{H.}{8 \text{ ft. } 8 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft.}}$ By Raphael Mengs.

From the collection of Joseph Bonaparte, who brought it from Spain. Born in 1728, in Bohemia, Mengs studied his art in Italy, and after a prosperous career as artist and writer, died at Rome in 1779. Inspired by his Italian studies, he tried to infuse ideal conception into the decayed style of German art of his time. In this picture he has successfully imitated the beautiful and original idea of Correggio in his "Holy Night," by making the light of his picture emanate from the Holy Child. Mengs was an able writer on art, and a sound, judicious critic. His rank as an artist has ever been a matter of dispute. Winkelman and others are enthusiastic over his genius and ability, while by some he has been declared only a dull imitator of the Italian school, without soul or invention. Surely this picture is not only a worthy imitation of Correggio, but shows strength and fine color. The prostrate figure in the foreground, in foreshortening and color, seems thoroughly original, and worthy of any master. His best pictures were painted at Madrid, where he was a great favorite, and this work was brought away by the ex-King of Spain, Joseph Bonaparte, who had facilities in securing good pictures and removing them from his capital.

28. GIRL AND PETS. On panel. $\frac{H.}{24\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{28\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}}$ Eastman Johnson. 1856.

Its simple naturalness in cool, subdued color, is in this fine artist's best manner. In the beginning of his artistic career Mr. Johnson was distinguished for his excellent crayon portraits; but after visiting Europe he took up painting, and in the class of genre subjects is the most successful artist in America. One of his earliest and best, "The Savoyard Sweep," is in the possession of George W. Riggs, Esq., of Washington.

34. THE TALKING WELL. "Lepuits qui parle." $\frac{H.}{5 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{3 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}}$
By A. Vely. 1873.

This charming picture is by one of the leading figure painters of France. The maiden is a model of rustic grace, and the coloring throughout is harmonious. Its sentiment is delicately expressed. The "talk" may come from the well, but it is evident, from the arch glance and smile of the maiden, that she suspects the whisper to be somewhat human. The picture has been made familiar to the public by the excellent photograph published by the Corcoran Gallery of Art.

35. SCENE AT FONTAINEBLEAU—COSTUME OF LOUIS XI. $\frac{H.}{21 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{31 \text{ in.}}$

P. C. Comte. 1874.

The artist resides at Fontainebleau, and he has here called up in harmonious color, and finished graceful form, a vision of such a court-beauty, in rich quaint attire and attended by a favorite hound, as was wont in the olden time to sweep with silken train along the bosky lanes of that royal demesne.

36. PROCESSION OF THE SACRED BULL APIS-OSIRIS. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft. } 9 \text{ in.}}$

By Frederic A. Bridgman, 1879.

Medals 1877, 1878. Member of the Legion of Honor.

The merits of this superb picture in fine conception, finished drawing, and exquisite color prove how well deserved are the honors bestowed upon this accomplished American artist by the Salon of Paris, and the mark of "hors concours" signifies the attainment of such excellence as to place him out of further competition for medals. He is chiefly known by his picture of the "Funeral of a Mummy."

Mr. Bridgman has brought to this work the accurate archaeological knowledge of his master Gerome, so that over this picturesque religious rite of old Egypt, its figures, its animals, dancing girls, priests, and columns there is an unquestionable authenticity, and conveyed in such rich color as Gerome himself never reached.

When the ancient Egyptians found a black and white bull marked with a triangular spot in the forehead and a cross on his back they believed that the animal contained the spirit of their god Osiris, and he was held sacred. The picture represents a procession in his honor. Over the pavement of a temple strewn with palm-leaves and lotus-flowers, Rameses II, the Great, and his queen lead it, the former dressed in priestly robes, throwing incense into the censer, and the latter holding the sistrum, a musical instrument; a hurly priest follows leading the sacred animal, garlanded with flowers, and over his back a scarlet cloth, embroidered with the outspread wings of the scarabeus. The beautiful dancing girls follow, and behind them come white-robed priests hearing the sacred ark, holding a ship typical of the commerce, as the stand of lotus-flowers and wheat signify the fertility, of the Nile. Beyond these a priest reads prayers, and the vista is closed up with the howed forms of other white-robed worshippers. In the left corner stands a smaller ark, surmounted by the figure jackal, also held sacred by the Egyptians. In a recess between the columns of the temple and behind the yellow curtain is a glimpse of a massive shrine made of red granite, where the light of the altar-fire is dimly seen. The sistrum in the hand of the queen and the lute held by the dancing girl are all exactly copied from veritable relics of Egypt now preserved in Berlin.

Mr. Bridgman was born in Alahama in 1847, of Northern parents. At five years he decided to be an artist. When sixteen he entered a hank-note engraving office in New York to learn to engrave heads and vignettes on steel. When eighteen he went to Paris, and for two years was a student under Gerome. After studying in Brittany nearly five years with the late Robert Wylie, artist, he returned to Paris, and remained there through the Franco-German war and the Commune. In 1872 he visited the Pyrenees, Algiers, Cairo, and went up the Nile as far as the second cataract.

He exhibited in the Salon, Paris, in 1868, and every year since. His first success, the "Circus in the Provinces," was in 1870. He received medals in 1877-1878, and was made member of the Legion of Honor at the Universal Exhibition at Paris, 1878.

37. LADY AND DOG.

H. W.
4 ft. 2 in. x 30 in.

By B. C. Porter. 1876.

Mr. Porter is a Boston artist, and he was unknown to the Washington public until this fine picture was exhibited here three years ago. Since then his name has become a "household word," associated with the memory of a work now fortunately the property of this Gallery, where it will remain "a joy forever." The delicate, thoughtful beauty of the lady's face is treated with a softness in marked contrast with the broad, free handling of other parts, while the whole picture seems saturated with a wealth of deep harmonious color. Not the least remarkable point in the technique is that of the dog, (whose ugliness is a powerful antithesis to the lovely face above him,) where a few broad touches appear to have done the work in a few minutes.

38. THE JUDGMENT OF PARIS.

H. W.
50 in. x 40 in.

H. P. Gray. 1861.

The fame of this eminent American artist rests chiefly upon this superb work. Mr. Gray modelled his style upon the Venetian school; and certainly he has here caught the grace and color of Titian in the beauteous form of Venus, the rapt admiration of Paris, pausing ere he gives the well-won prize, and the arch expression of Cupid. The general form of Venus is obviously suggested by that of the Venus of Milo, but surely the lost arms of the latter could never have had more graceful position than Mr. Gray has given to this charming semblance of a flesh-and-blood Venus Victrix.

This picture is from the Olyphant Collection. Mr. Gray was born in 1819 and died in 1877.

39. FINE WEATHER.

H. W.
20 x 31

By Luigi Chialiva. 1880.

Chialiva is a native of Italy, but is one of the colony of French artists at Ecouen, and a very popular one. He has a refined feeling for landscape, is very fond of children, and loves to introduce them with animals as in this work, where in a field stretching away to a farm-house a little girl, while having her hair decked with flowers by her sister, rouses the ire of the gobbler by flourishing before him a bunch of red ones.

40. A SHOWER.

H. W.
20 x 31

By Luigi Chialiva. 1880.

Here we have a charming group of children and a little lamb sheltered under the big family umbrella amid a flock of sheep. The shower is about over, passing away in a veil of mist over the winding river and distant village. The young lambs are leaving the shelter of their dams and sporting around, one leaping over its mother towards the little one in the children's lap. The gentler points in this choice example of Chialiva are balanced by the vigorous treatment of the sheep.

42. LOST DOGS. "Cri au perdu!"H. W.
4 ft. 9½ in. x 3 ft. 11½ in.

By O. Von Thoren. 1873.

Here is an animal picture, equal to Landseer's in point of close adherence to nature. The contrast between the two dogs, the active distress of one and the mute resignation of the other, lost at the close of a wintry day, is forcibly depicted. The picture was exhibited at the Vienna Exposition in 1873.

44. AUTUMN AFTERNOON ON LAKE GEORGE.

H. W.
4 ft. 6 ft.

(From the Olyphant Collection.) By John F. Kensett. 1864.

By many considered Mr. Kensett's finest landscape. From an open foreground of rocks and fallen trees, guarded by a noble group whose variously-hued foliage is relieved against the luminous sky, we look over groves sloping to the blue bosom of the island-dotted lake, while on the further shore rise high-peaked mountains

"—— that like giants stand
To sentinel enchanted land!"

The flush of autumn broods over these groves, peaks, and the "tender azure of the unruffled" lake, as they melt into the hazy warmth of the coming sunset with a pervading harmony most soothing. Here are no glaring spots of color, of bright yellow, red, or green, to break the dreamy repose of the scene. A quiet pastoral feature is given below the left foreground, where are dimly seen cattle and a rustic bridge over a stream issuing from the shadowy forest and showing its white crest as it tumbles over the rocks below.

Mr. Kensett was born in Connecticut in 18—. After learning the engraver's art he studied landscape painting under Casilear, another engraver, and went to England, where he acquired his early cool, gray style of color. The "Lake George" proved his power over the autumn landscape. He afterwards went to Italy. On his return to New York in 1848 he took rank as a leading landscapist, rising rapidly to fame and fortune, until his death in 1872. He was unequalled in painting rocks, either as "swill'd by the wild and wasteful ocean" at his favorite Newport, or when vaguely mingled with undergrowth, tree-stumps, and trailing plants, as exemplified in the foreground of this picture.

45. THE FÊTE OF ST. JOHN IN DALECARLIA, SWEDEN.

H. W.
3 ft. 10 in. x 7 ft. 6 in.

By Hugo Salmson. 1874.

The artist of this interesting work is a native of Sweden, so that it may be received as a true picture of a village festival in that iron-mining region. Here, at twilight, while the last red streak of sunset and the young moon are seen through the murky cloud of smoke and mist, the miners are in the height of their enjoyment. A band of dancing musicians heads the procession, bearing a pole covered with evergreens, which they are about to set up; behind them a group of girls are dancing; a man on a barrel fires a feu de joie with a pistol; while beyond are seen other groups in the dance, or seated at tables near the public-house. The great point in the picture is the group on the left, where the miners, with their wives and children, are seated feasting and smoking, while their pastor, meerschaum in hand, stands near, with face radiant with kindly jollity. There is a wonderful diversity of character in these numerous figures, in all positions, and of all ages and complexions.

This admirable picture was numbered 1,639 in the catalogue of the Paris Exposition of 1874, and was one of a lot selected by the French Government, but their fund being too limited for them all, the work, fortunately for the Corcoran Gallery of Art, was returned to the artist.

46. COUNT EBERHARD, of WIRTEMBERG, ("The Weeper.") $\frac{H}{5 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.}}$

By Ary Scheffer.

The subject of this picture is as follows: Ulrich, son of Count Eberhard, had lost the battle of Rentlingen, and was dangerously wounded. Many of the nobility were slain. On his recovery he leisurely sought his father, at Stuttgart, and found him over his solitary meal. He was coldly received. Not a word was spoken. With downcast eyes he placed himself opposite his father. Fish and wine were served to him. The old count seized a knife, and cut the table-cloth between them. Frenzied by this insult, Ulrich rushed into the middle of the next fight, gains the battle of Doffingen, and is slain.—Ballad of Uhlard.

"And while we were celebrating the victory in our camp, what was our old count doing? Alone in his tent, weeping over the dead body of his only son!"—Ballad of Schiller.

There has been much useless discussion about the sex of the dead figure in this picture, on account of its girlish features, and some persons even insist it represents Joan of Arc; but any one referring to the spirited translation by the late Lord Lytton of Schiller's ballad upon this theme will see that the count's son was but "a stripling," and that the hair parted in the middle (just as the count's is) would naturally give to delicate features after death that appearance of effeminacy which puzzles so many observers.

A copy of this picture is in the Rotterdam Museum, and another, illustrating the scene at the table, called "Cutting the Table-Cloth." The French Government has also a copy of "The Weeper;" but the one in this catalogue is the original picture, and far superior to all others. There is also a copy in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts.

The deep, solemn tone and transparent richness of color in this picture are remarkable, and completely refute Ruskin's absurd sneer, "that two mule-loads of earth represent Ary Scheffer."

The portrait of Lafayette in the House of Representatives is by Ary Scheffer. There is in Washington also a portrait of Commodore Morris, painted in 1826. Scheffer was born at Dordrecht, Holland, in 1795, and died in 1858.

47. CROMWELL AND MILTON. $\frac{H. \quad W.}{5 \text{ ft. } \times 7 \text{ ft.}}$ By E. Leutze. 1857.

This picture, painted for Mr. Corcoran, portrays the intimacy between Oliver Cromwell and his Latin secretary, John Milton, poet. The latter is represented as entertaining, by his skilful performance upon the organ, the Protector, his family, and friends. The children were painted from the artist's own. Leutze died in 1868.

Leutze was a German by birth, but came to this country when young. In the early part of his career, as a wandering portrait painter in Virginia, he astonished good judges by his brilliant color and dashing style. His success took him to Dusseldorf, where, under Lessing, he soon displayed his power as a historical painter, sending home—chiefly to Philadelphia—picture after picture of great dramatic power and picturesque treatment. Several of these were of noble heroic sentiment, such as his "Landing of the Norsemen." He is more popularly known by his "Washington crossing the Delaware."

48. SUNSET. $\frac{H. \quad W.}{3 \text{ ft. } 7 \text{ in. } \times 5 \text{ ft. } 6 \text{ in.}}$ By Emile Breton. 1873.

The same artist of the simple but effective winter scene at moonrise (No. 60, West Gallery) here shows with what power he can render the ruddier glow of sunset, and the solemn repose of river, road, and groves under approaching twilight.

49. A SPRING LANDSCAPE. $\frac{H. \quad W.}{3 \text{ ft. } 3 \text{ in. } \times 5 \text{ ft. } 3 \text{ in.}}$ By Louis Japy. 1873.

The production of a distinguished French landscapist, full of tender color and vernal freshness.

50. TWILIGHT. $\frac{H. \quad W.}{3 \text{ ft. } 3 \text{ in. } \times 5 \text{ ft. } 3 \text{ in.}}$ By Louis Japy, 1873.

A pendant to the above, and, contrasted with it, the versatility of the artist is shown in the grave colors of the landscape at the close of day, as its level plain stretches away to the twilight sky.

51. A MONK FISHING. $\frac{H.}{36 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{28 \text{ in.}}$ By L. A. G. Loustenau. 1874.
A humorous subject, in the vein of Hogarth. Beside the shallow stagnant moat of an old ruin, a monk, fat, oleaginous, and contented, is seated fishing. He has much tackle and a huge scoop-basket, for a great day's sport, but the three bull-frogs on the bank by his side show the extent of his success. From the Paris Exposition of 1874. No. 1,239.
52. THE DISPUTED SHOT. $\frac{H.}{36 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{29 \text{ in.}}$ By J. M. Stanley.
This artist is generally known by his Indian portraits and scenery, many of which were in the Smithsonian Institution when it was burnt in 1865.
53. PORTRAIT OF PRESIDENT JOHN TYLER, VA. $\frac{H.}{29 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{36 \text{ in.}}$ G. P. A. Healy.
54. PORTRAIT OF M. LASTEYRIE. $\frac{H.}{28 \frac{1}{2} \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{23 \text{ in.}}$ By Rembrandt Peale.
This picture is marked on the back as the portrait of a "distinguished French economist and author—the first to establish a museum of natural history, and writer on cotton and merino sheep," and that it was painted in wax in Paris, (no date,) by Rembrandt Peale, for the Philadelphia Museum.
Rembrandt Peale, son of Charles Wilson Peale, was born 1778, and died in 1860. Washington sat to him for his portrait when the artist was only eighteen. In later life, by careful use of the studies made of his illustrious sitter, Peale painted the portrait of Washington bought by Congress in 1832, which hung for a long time in the old Senate chamber, and is now in the room of the President of the Senate. Chief-Justice Marshall and others always declared it the best likeness of Washington ever painted.
55. GENERAL ANDREW JACKSON. $\frac{H.}{7 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft.}}$ By Thomas Sully. 1825.
Mr. Sully excelled chiefly in female heads, but this is a vigorous portrait of a subject of strongly-marked masculine character.
56. PORTRAIT OF THOMAS SULLY. $\frac{H.}{30 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{25 \text{ in.}}$ (Painted by himself.)
Mr. Sully was born in England in 1783, came to this country in 1792, and resided in Philadelphia. He died in 18 . His portrait of Queen Victoria in her coronation robes, painted for the St. George's Society of Philadelphia, was his greatest work.
57. PORTRAIT OF JOHN RANDOLPH OF ROANOKE, VA. $\frac{H.}{30 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{25 \text{ in.}}$ C. Harding.
All who remember Mr. Randolph will pronounce this a striking likeness of that personage, so singular in aspect and eccentric in character. Of his tall, spare frame, small, thin face, clear, bright eye, petulant caprice, and caustic, ready repartee, the old citizens of Washington have abundant memories. The portrait was recently secured by Mr. Corcoran as a valuable historical addition to the Gallery, and was painted over forty years ago.
Mr. Randolph was born in 1773, and died in 1833. His grandfather married the great-granddaughter of Pocahontas. He was a representative in Congress from 1799 to 1829, with an interval of two years—1825–27—in the Senate. His boyish face and voice made him look so young that when first sworn in, being asked if he was of the legal age, he characteristically retorted, "Go ask my constituents!" He went as Minister to Russia in 1830, but ill-health caused his death shortly after his return.
The artist of this portrait was born in Massachusetts in 1792, and died in Boston in 1866. His early life was a heritage of poverty and hard field-labor. Going to the West, he was first a chairmaker, then a sign-painter, until the work of a stray portrait-painter called forth his talent in that way. After some study in Philadelphia, and years of successful pursuit of his new art in St. Louis, he went to Boston, where he attained a brilliant reputation as a fit successor to Gilbert Stuart, then passing away. He next visited London and enjoyed the support and society of the British nobility. On his return, he first visited Washington in the winter of 1829–30, memorable for the great encounter of Webster and Hayne in the Senate, and his studio was filled with the portraits of the statesmen, judges, and chief citizens of that day. This portrait was probably painted at that time. He lacked early training in his art, and his drawing was often defective; but his fine luminous color and aptness in seizing the natural aspect of his sitters made all his portraits agreeable and striking.

* In the East Gallery.

58. THE DEATH OF MOSES. ^{H. 9 ft. 4 in. x 13 ft. W.} By Alexander Cabanel. 1851.

The early work of a French artist, now eminent, painted when studying in Rome. It seems to be the ambitious effort of a young genius—strong, but immature—upon a theme of the greatest dignity and difficulty. The artist's purpose was to illustrate the death of Moses, as described in the following passage of Holy Writ:

"And the Lord said unto him: 'This is the land which I swear unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give unto thy seed. I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither.'

"So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died there, in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord."—Deuteronomy, xxxiv: 4, 5.

Jehovah is represented as pointing to the Promised Land, and at the same time indicating with the other hand that Moses is not to "go thither." Groups of angels support the majestic form of the Jewish leader, who turns towards his Maker a countenance full of reverence, resignation, and faith, as the angels lift him from the earth heavenward. The form and face of Moses are of the grandest type and expression. The fans of light spreading from the forehead are owing to the artist having adopted the error into which Michael Angelo and all the artists of Catholic Europe fell, in representing Moses with horns in sculpture, and with fans of light in painting. A learned critic has recently shown that this error of the artists arose from Jerome having wrongly translated into the Latin Vulgate as cornuta or horned the Hebrew and Greek word signifying "rayed" or "radiant," descriptive of the light on the face of Moses when he descended from the presence of Jehovah.

59. CHARLOTTE CORDAY IN PRISON.

^{H. 3 ft. 5 in. x 2 ft. 8½ in. W.} Charles Louis Muller. 1875.

This impressive picture is by an eminent French artist known by his "Roll-call" of the victims of the guillotine during the first French Revolution. He has won three medals, is an officer of the Legion of Honor, and a member of the Institute of France.

Charlotte Corday, descended from a noble family, though a republican, determined to rid the republic of the blood-thirsty Marat, who sent to the guillotine all opposed to him. She managed to get an audience with the monster while in his bath, and as he was in the act of taking the names of some of her countrymen as fresh victims, she stabbed him to the heart. After a trial she was guillotined on the 17th of July, 1793, aged 25 years. She never repented the deed, and displayed firmness and composure to the last, except when the executioner removing part of her dress brought the blush of modesty to her fair face.

The artist has depicted her in the garb of a rustic, with tricolor ribbons on her cap, resting languidly upon the rusty iron bars of her prison window. Her right arm is braced against the stone wall, the hand holding a pen, supporting the drooping head. The left hand clasps the iron bars—a touching contrast between its delicate, slender fingers and the rusty metal. The pose of the form shows weariness, as does also the noble pale face looking through the grating with a thrilling, earnest mournfulness. She appears as if, weary with writing the noble letter below, to her father, she had sought the window for air untainted by prison walls. Her mouth shows unflinching firmness, and her eyes show watchfulness and sadness—but not the sorrow of personal affliction. There is in them no sign of remorse, nor of regret, unless over the necessity of her terrible act. Their introverted expression speaks of a heart brooding over the fate of her country.

"Pardon me, my dear father, for having disposed of my life without your permission. I have avenged many victims—prevented others. The people will one day acknowledge the service I have rendered my country. For your sake I wished to remain incognito; but it was impossible. I only trust you will not be injured by what I have done. Farewell, my beloved father! Forget me, or rather rejoice at my fate, for it has sprung from a noble cause. Embrace my sister for me, whom I love with all my heart. Never forget the words of Corneille—the crime makes the shame, and not the scaffold.”

The picture is free from the tragic treatment the subject is too apt to receive from French artists. Its color throughout is grave and subdued. The clear, pale face, the plain gray garb, the stone wall, and rusty bars, are all in solemn keeping. Even the rosy tips of the exquisitely moulded tinted fingers harmonize with the prevailing gravity of color. This noble picture came directly from the hand of the artist to this Gallery.

60. PORTRAIT OF CHIEF-JUSTICE SHIPPEN, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

H. 29 in. W. x 24 in.

By Gilbert Stuart.

There can be no finer example than this of the skill of perhaps the greatest portrait-painter of modern times.

Gilbert Stuart was born in Rhode Island, in 1756, and died in 1828. Acquiring some knowledge of painting at home, at an early age he went to England, and studied with West, and his ability in portraiture soon showed itself in portraits of distinguished Englishmen. At the close of 1794 he returned to America, for the chief purpose of painting the likeness of Washington for the Marquis of Lansdowne. He painted but three portraits of Washington from life. One he destroyed; the second he made life-size for his noble patron, and the third is now in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. From these he painted twenty-six copies. Though some considered his male portraits his strong point, the portrait of Mrs. Washington, also in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, is a proof that he could successfully adapt his pencil to the softer lines and complexion of woman.

61. PORTRAIT OF M. F. P. G. GUIZOT. H. 7 ft. 10 in. W. x 5 ft. 8 in. G. P. A. Healy. 1841.

This portrait of the late Prime-Minister of Louis Philippe, and historian, deceased in 1874, is pronounced one of Healy's best works, and was painted in Paris, 1841, to the order of some American residents there, in compliment to the French statesman for his memoir of George Washington. The picture was presented by them to the National Institute, a scientific association then existing in Washington. When that body no longer existed, the painting was turned over to the Smithsonian Institution, and it is now transferred to the keeping of the Corcoran Gallery of Art.

Mr. Guizot was born in 1787, and died in 1874. As a likeness the picture was considered a great success, and is remarkable for its refined, statesman-like dignity, propriety of color, and the rich arrangement of the accessories.

Mr. Healy was born in 1808, has studied and practised his art many years in Paris, and is one of the most industrious and prosperous of our portrait-painters.

62. PORTRAIT OF HENRY CLAY. H. 26½ in. W. x 21½ in. Attributed to Henry Inman.

63. PORTRAIT OF THE LATE HON. WM. C. PRESTON, S. C.* (From the Smithsonian Institution.) H. 29 in. W. x 36 in. By G. P. A. Healy.

Another strong portrait from the pencil of Mr. Healy, the likeness of which all friends of that Senator must recognize. Mr. Preston was brother to General Preston, the great friend of Powers, the sculptor, and was among the first that recognized the merits of the latter, and introduced him to his brother.

64. PORTRAIT OF BERNARDIN SAINT PIERRE. H. 28 in. W. x 23 in.

Presented by G. W. Riggs, Esq.

This portrait of the author of "Paul and Virginia" was painted in wax, from life, by Rembrandt Peale, in Paris, in 1808. St. Pierre, born in 1737, was an engineer officer, who, after an adventurous life in the West Indies, returned to France, and there wrote his charming books.

65. THE FARM-HOUSE. H. 2 ft. 11 in. W. x 3 ft. 8 in. By George Morland.
Perhaps the finest picture by this artist in America. Morland was born in 1763,

* In the East Gallery.

and died in 1804. He was the son of an unsuccessful painter. It is said he drew well when only four years old, gained reputation by sketches exhibited in the Royal Academy when in his eleventh year, and at nineteen began his career as a great artist and a dissolute man. By his intemperate habits he fell into the hands of men who plied him with drink to rob him of his pictures. One of these wretches kept him so long in this bondage that he actually obtained enough of Morland's pictures to exhibit them publicly—"admittance half-a-crown." He subsequently led a careless, roving life among the rural districts of England, paying his tavern bills by sketches and finished pictures. Perhaps it was of this picture the story is told that, when finished, a rustic staring at it, being asked how he liked the work, replied, "They be deadly like pigs, but who ever saw one eating from a trough without one leg in it?" Morland took the hint, as here represented.

66. MOONRISE IN MADEIRA. ^{H. 36 in. x W. 48 in.} By E. Hildebrandt.

The force of color and intensity of light in this picture are quite dazzling. It was painted for Mr. Corcoran, through Baron Humboldt, with whom the artist (now deceased) was on terms of close personal intimacy.

67. SHAKESPEARE AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES. ^{H. 4 ft. 5 in. x W. 5 ft. 7½ in.} John Faed.

This picture, so interesting from the various groups of statesmen and authors in the picturesque and rich costume of their time, gathered round the great central figure of Shakespeare, is by one of the leading modern artists of England, and has been finely engraved, with a key indicating the names of those represented.

John Faed is a Scotchman, and one of three brothers eminent in art. Thomas Faed is the famous painter of "Sir Walter Scott and his Friends at Abbotsford," and also of subjects of Scottish genre, such as "The Mitherless Bairn." James Faed is the engraver of the excellent print of this picture, dedicated to Mr. Corcoran.

68 "LE REGIMENT QUI PASSE." ^{H. 50 in. x W. 50 in.} By Edouard Detaille. 1875.

The artist of this fine work is a pupil of the famous Meissonier, and has already attained the highest rank as a painter of military subjects, in a style worthy of his great master. He has won three medals and the badge of the Legion of Honor. This picture first appeared in the Paris Exposition of 1875, and was afterwards exhibited in Brussels, where it was bought for the Corcoran Gallery of Art.

It represents a regiment of the line passing along the Boulevard of St. Martin at the close of a wet, snowy day in December. The street is filled with a solid mass of soldiery vanishing in the misty distance, and headed by a drum-corps, before which strides a stalwart drum-major. On the sidewalks are pedestrians, some with children in their arms, watching the pageant, and on either side of the muddy street, and in advance of the military, tramp motley groups of school-boys, apprentices, and sturdy workmen, all stepping out in sympathy with the music, through the slushy ruts of yellow Parisian mud. The movement of these groups is admirably rendered. On the extreme right is a portrait of Meissonier himself. On the opposite side is a capital lounging figure of a sergent-de-ville, and near him a more masterly one of a man tugging along a hand-cart. The crowd of boys affords an endless study of character; nor must be overlooked the muddy little dog in front, looking aside at the drum-major. Beyond, are omnibuses and fiacres, filled and piled up with passengers, cloaked and umbrellaed, and over them loom up the grand forms of the Portes St. Martin and St. Denis, which, with other lofty buildings, snow-covered, recede in dim perspective in the muffled air. The architectural grandeur of this picture is one of its strongest points of merit.

69. THE MASK; OR, FUN AND FRIGHT. ^{H. 30 in. x W. 42 in.} Chierici, Gaetano. 1874.

This popular work is by a Milanese artist who has won distinction by subjects similar to this, painted in broad masses of fine color with great imitative skill and perception of serio-comic humor. The story is seen at a glance. The mischievous boy at the kitchen door has just lowered from his grinning face the ugly mask that has frightened the little girl from her meal of macaroni on the chair, and caused her to tumble over and cling to the dress of her buxom mother, who, with a face of startled anger and with uplifted wooden ladle, threatens the urchin. Though the boy enjoys the fun of his trick, he is evidently doubtful of its result to him, as he has planted his legs in a way to show he is ready for a rapid retreat. The picture acquires more interest from the fact that the kitchen, with its various accessories painted with such realistic finish, represents the one in which Chierici lived when a poor struggling artist; that the boy and girl are his own children, and the cook a relative.

70. BEACH AT SCHEVENINGEN, Holland. $\frac{H.}{2\frac{1}{4} \text{ ft.}} \times \frac{W.}{4\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.}}$ F. H Kaemmerer. 1874.

This remarkable work is by a native of Holland, but now one of the resident artists of Paris, where it was exhibited in the Exposition of 1874, No. 1006. The fashionably-dressed young man with gray hat on the right of the picture is a portrait of the artist. The subject is painted with a peculiar open-air effect, startling at first, but true to nature. A cold, slaty sky bends over gay groups assembled on the beach of a Dutch watering-place, and brings all the finely-pencilled details into clear relief. The artificiality of the fashionably-dressed seaside loiterers is balanced by the summer sea and the groups of children wading and sporting near the light waves breaking upon the sand. This happy contrast has its climax in the group in the left foreground, where the gaily attired city miss bends over the coarse garb and brown face of the fisher-girl that holds up her shells for sale. Other fine traits of character are seen in the exquisite languor depicted in the form of the fair invalid, with dainty feet supported on a stool, and the placid content of the worthy priest listening to the chat of a belle. The technical skill of the artist is successfully shown in his way of grouping together so many objects of the lightest color—the white dresses, white chairs, and white wagons, without confusion, and in proper relief.

71. SOUVENIRS OF THE SIXTEENTH AND SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES. $\frac{H.}{40 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{36 \text{ in.}}$
By B. Des Goffe. 1874.

The curious objects in this picture are grouped in the lower open part of a credence, or carved ebony cabinet of the 17th century, which was sent from Spain to Admiral Nelson, at Paris, for repair, and is now in the Musée de Cluny. The pistols are of Italian manufacture of the 16th century. The dark enamelled cup and the white Faience cup are of the time of Henry II, and are also in the same museum. The chief object in the picture is the large boat-shaped cup of lapis lazuli, of the 17th century, now in the Louvre, where its designation is Nacelle. Neptune, with trident, silver gilt, is seated on a shell at the stern; and at the prow is the head of a sea-monster with open jaws. Below there are large grotesque masks, while smaller ones support the base.

The careful drawing and delicate finish of this example of still life are only equalled by the refined selection of the objects and subdued propriety of the coloring.

72. A FAMILY OF SATYRS. $\frac{H.}{6 \text{ ft. } 6 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{7 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.}}$ By Louis Priou. 1874.

This great work is by a pupil of Cabanel, and took a gold medal of the first class at the Paris Exposition, 1874. No. 1522 on the Catalogue.

The prodigious vigor of the composition and its fine color are equal to the artist's thorough classical conception of the subject. The whole scene is replete with the spirit of the wild, joyous sylvan life, associated with those imaginary wood-deities of the ancients.

73. THE HEIR PRESUMPTIVE. $\frac{H.}{3\frac{1}{2} \text{ ft.}} \times \frac{W.}{6 \text{ ft.}}$ By G. H. Boughton, 1873.

A scene in an English park about a century since, when its young heir is taking a morning walk on a cool autumnal day with a stately matron, caressing his noble dog, while a pet poodle trots alongside the lady. Behind them a black servant in livery leads his young master's pony, and in front an old rustic stops his work of sweeping up the autumnal leaves to pay his obeisance to the promenaders.

The picture was first exhibited in the British Royal Academy, and combined the excellences of the artist's peculiar style, being simple in composition, of cool and subdued color, of quiet delineation of character, with a subtle refinement pervading the whole work. Not the least merit of it is the admirable treatment of the landscape, and the exquisite vista through the group of beeches. Mr. Boughton was born in England, but came to this country at an early age. After growing up in his brother's hat store in Albany, his love for art took him to New York for instruction. His talent for painting first inclined to landscape, and in 1857 his first picture was exhibited. He soon acquired reputation and the means of studying his art in Europe, where his success as an eminent painter is now established. He resides in England, and his pictures are eagerly sought at high prices. His subjects have been chiefly devoted to the illustration of the Puritan settlement of New England.

74. SUNDAY MORNING IN AUVERGNE. $\frac{H.}{2 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{3 \text{ ft. } 10 \text{ in.}}$ J. A. Bail. 1874.

This picture of the interior of a French cottage is full of interest. The glad some light in the child's eyes as her mother puts the last pin in her dress; the patient attitude of the grandmother, waiting, prayer-book in hand; the girl descending the stairs, the natural air of the old woman arranging her cap, and the two men taking a cup of wine before leaving for church, are all told with marked character. Also from the Exposition of 1874.

75. CONSTANTINOPLE, from the Golden Horn. $\frac{H.}{32 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{50 \text{ in.}}$ Felix Ziem. 1874.

A powerful example of an artist famous for his glowing pictures of Venice, and other cities near the borders of the Mediterranean. Its rough, expressive handling, seen at a proper distance, is lost in a softness that steepens the mass of the city in a voluptuous haze, while the walls, domes, and minarets are flushed with the orange light of an Oriental sunset.

76. FLOWER-PIECE. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 9 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{4 \text{ ft. } 10 \text{ in.}}$ By E. G. Couder. 1873.

A superb example of one of the leading flower-painters of France. The wealth of color in the vase of flowers, the angry terror of the cat that has upset the vase, the delicate imitation of the water upon the table, show the comprehensive ability of a true master.

77. TROUT BROOK IN THE CATSKILLS. $\frac{H.}{2 \text{ ft. } 10 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{4 \text{ ft.}}$ W. Whittredge. 1875.

A burst of sunlight through the trees falls upon their stems and the green margin of the stream, bringing out the coffee-colored hue of the water very truthfully.

Mr. Whittredge is a native of Ohio, and after years of study in Europe follows his art in New York city.

- 78.* FRENCH CUIRASSIERS BRINGING IN BAVARIAN PRISONERS.

In water-colors.

$\frac{H.}{17 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{22 \text{ in.}}$

Edouard Detaille. 1875.

This fine aquarelle shows Detaille's skill in water-colors to be fully equal to his work in oil-colors. In this example we have the literal detail of a photograph, combined with the finest perception of military character and rich color. It represents a scene after a battle at Orleans; one of the few encounters where the French had the advantage. The national characteristics of captors and captives are well rendered, as also the contrast between the careless attitudes of the officers, the stiff, stolid forms of the watchful guards, and the unconcern of the rustic-looking prisoners.

Detaille is a patient student of every branch of his art to the simplest details. The chief trooper in the foreground was painted from a cuirassier, who with his horse stood for days in the artist's yard.

79. IDEAL HEAD. $\frac{H.}{27 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{22 \text{ in.}}$ By Geo. A. Baker. 1865.

80. JUSTICE TO LIEVIN PYN, 1541. $\frac{H.}{3 \text{ ft. } 9 \text{ in.}} \times \frac{W.}{5 \text{ ft. } 11 \text{ in.}}$ By F. Pauwels. 1862.

Lievyn Pyn, First Magistrate of Ghent, was wrongly accused by his ambitious colleagues, and beheaded by order of Charles V. Afterwards, the emperor, convinced of his innocence, ordered solemn mass, and a proclamation to be read by the priest declaring Pyn's innocence, in the presence of his mourning family and four of his accusers.

There is fine discrimination of character in the faces of these last. The first shows the unrepentant haughtiness of a bigot, there is a disturbed conviction in the downward look of the second, a fixed nervous apprehension in the third, and a meek penitence, real or dissembled, in the fourth.

* In the East Side Gallery.

Pauwels is an eminent artist of the Netherlands, and has won several gold medals. He is Professor of Historical Painting at Weimar. The picture is from the Strousberg Collection, Berlin.

81. NIAGARA FALLS. $\begin{matrix} \text{H.} & \text{W.} \\ 3 \text{ ft. } 6 \text{ in.} & \times 7 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ F. E. Church. 1857.
Of this great picture of a great American subject, by a great American artist, it may be said that it represents all of the mighty scene in nature save its sound and motion, though the latter element of its sublimity is grandly suggested in the rush of its massive green depths and the varied sweep and surging eddies of its shallower waters. It was exhibited throughout America and Europe, carried off a gold medal at the Paris Exposition, and was purchased at the sale of the collection of J. Taylor Johnston, N. Y., for this Gallery. Mr. Church never painted a copy of it, for it is to be said in his honor that he never repeats his pictures.

87. PORTRAIT OF WM. PAGE, Artist. $\begin{matrix} \text{H.} & \text{W.} \\ 24 \text{ in.} & \times 20 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Thomas Le Clear. 1876.
An excellent example of Mr. Le Clear's skill, and a life-like portrait of an eminent artist. It was exhibited in the British Royal Academy, 1876, and elicited marked praise for its admirable execution in middle-tints.
88. THE TORNADO. $\begin{matrix} \text{H.} & \text{W.} \\ 45 \text{ in.} & \times 64 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ By Thomas Cole. 1831.
This grand picture of a scene as sublime as "ever savage Rosa dash'd," was painted in London and exhibited in the Royal Academy. Through the darkened air a burst of light illumines the shattered trees in the foreground, with weird glimpses of rocks, cascades, and other trees beyond wrestling with the tempest. The observer can compare this sublime phase of Cole's genius with the calm glory of the summer morning in his "Departure," hanging below. (From the Olyphant Collection.)
89. ON THE PINCIAN HILL, ROME. Cardinal questioning Acolytes. $\begin{matrix} \text{H.} & \text{W.} \\ 2 \text{ ft. } 9 \text{ in.} & \times 4 \text{ ft. } 7 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Ferdinand Heilbuth.
Variety of character and brilliant color abound in this work by Heilbuth, renowned also for his water colors.
The earnest but not severe look of the Cardinal seems rather to abash the acolytes, though thoughtfulness is stamped upon each downcast face, while the priest beyond is evidently encouraging the lads at his end of the line.
Though born in Hamburg, Heilbuth is a naturalized French artist. Here is his record: 2d medal, 1857; recalled for medals in 1859 and 1861; member of the Legion of Honor 1861, and placed hors concours—that is, no longer to compete for medals against less eminent artists.
90. MOUNT CORCORAN, (Southern Sierra Nevada.) $\begin{matrix} \text{H.} & \text{W.} \\ 5 \text{ ft.} & \times 8 \text{ ft.} \end{matrix}$ A. Bierstadt. 1875.
This striking picture combines the best characteristics of the style of Mr. Bierstadt, the first pioneer-painter to reveal to us the sublime scenery of the far West. The artist has given names to several mountains in the Sierra Nevada range, afterwards adopted, and he named this majestic peak, rising 14,094 feet, in compliment to one that rises high above his fellows in boundless munificence for the cause of art. The picture was bought and presented to the Gallery by Mr. Corcoran.
The view is taken from a little lake five miles from the mountain, and is portrayed under effects that give sublimity to its forms without veiling its elements of beauty. Athwart the breast of the snow-capped peak roll stormy masses of vapor, those on the left towering up in sulphurous-tinted cumulous shape, with their lower skirts darkening the rocky slopes, out of whose depths leaps a cascade to the green lake that mirrors its trailing line of light. On the right a grove of the giant pines of that region is relieved against the rolling clouds, and recedes to a rocky point in the middle distance. From this point the shore curves round to the left ground, ending in a mass of half-submerged rocks and trees receding in the transparent green margin of the lake. Midway across the yellow curve of the beach, lighted up by a patch of sunlight, stalks a black bear on his way for a bath or drink, heightening the scene's wild solitude. The foreground is enriched by the scarlet tufts of the dwarf willow, common to that region.

Mr. Bierstadt was born at Dusseldorf, Germany, in 1828, and in his second year came with his parents to New Bedford, Mass. He began to paint in oils in 1851, and soon went to study his art at Dusseldorf. After studying also the scenery of Switzerland and Italy, he returned to New York in 1857. Soon his genius sought themes for his pencil in the scenery of the Rocky Mountains, whither he went with General Lander's Exploring Expedition as a painter. The scenery of California—of the Sierra Nevada—has since furnished to him inexhaustible themes. Says Tuckerman: "We are glad to have the Dusseldorf style so represented among us by Bierstadt; it is admirably adapted to some scenes and subjects; it adds to the variety and popularity of our landscape art; its contrasts are desirable, and appeal to minds otherwise insensible to more vague and latent art-language."

118. AFTERNOON IN EARLY JUNE. H. W. C. E. Brenner. 1880.
 26 x 46
 The style of color of this work is at first startling to eyes accustomed to see nature treated at a later season or in a conventional way. Repeated study of it, however, will show that Mr. Brenner has displayed in it close observation of scenery and successful effort to imitate a phase of nature most difficult to be represented, and which too many landscapists fear to grapple with. He is a Kentucky artist, who has struggled in his profession with but few advantages, and this attempt to represent a grove of beeches in his native State gives abundant promise of a successful future.

121. A PASTORAL VISIT. H. W. R. N. Brooke. 1881.
 46 in. 62 in.
 Here we have the interior of the cabin of a field-negro in soiled clothes, surrounded by his wife and children after his noon-tide meal. He has just laid down his banjo, and listens with stolid respect to the colored pastor just dropped in, who holds his plate to the wife for a mess of bonny-clabber, while he turns to address the husband. His umbrella, hat, and prayer-book are behind him. His bald head, circle of white hair, gray beard, and kindly expression of his eyes, make the pastor's figure one of faultless character, while all the accessories of the kitchen make the scene what it professes to be, one from real life.
 Mr. Brooke is a young Virginian who studied his art in Paris under the celebrated Bonnat, and has set a good example to his brother-artists returned from foreign study, by applying his art to a subject wholly American.
122. PORTRAIT OF THE HON. HENRY CLAY, Ky. H. W. 36 in. 28 in.
 By Chas. B. King. 1822.
 Painted when the eminent statesman was in his zenith. The shirt-ruffles, plum-colored coat, stiff rolling velvet collar, brass buttons, and hair over his forehead, denote the costume of the time. This portrait was considered the best ever taken. In after years, Mr. Clay wore his hair combed back from his noble forehead. He holds in his right hand a paper inscribed with his Resolution dated Feb. 21, 1822, declaring the sympathy of the people of the United States with the struggles of the Provinces of South America for liberty, and the intention of Congress to aid the President, in a constitutional way, when he deems it expedient to recognize their independence.

A very popular engraving of the portrait was published many years ago.

This interesting portrait of the author of "Home, Sweet Home" was painted by the celebrated Jarvis for Mr. Meredith, of Baltimore, when Payne was about 17 years of age. It was presented to Mr. Corcoran by Mr. Gilmor Meredith, and figured in the final obsequies of Payne at Oakhill. Though injured, the work shows the spirit of Jarvis' style, who has given to the eyes a certain poetic light, and graceful air to the head that formed much of the beauty that Payne was known to possess in early manhood.

37. THE TROJAN HORSE. H. W.
3 ft. 3 in. x 5 ft. By Henri Motte. 1874.
After ten years' siege of Troy, the Greeks constructed an enormous wooden horse, inside of which some of their bravest warriors were hidden. The rest burnt their tents and sailed away. The Trojans, thinking their troubles were ended, broke down their walls, and dragged the horse into their city. While carousing at night over their good fortune, the Greeks descended from the horse, and other forces arriving, the city was taken.
Under the solemn light of the moon the Greeks are seen descending by one cord, while their brazen shields are let down by another. After slaying the Trojan guards, they stealthily creep behind the battlements, and descend to the devoted city. Though the huge mechanism of the horse subordinates the human figures, the drawing and perspective of the whole scene are learned and well executed. The picture is from the Paris Exposition of 1874.

Considered a faithful view of that remarkable coast scene.
48. AUTUMNAL CORN AND GRAPES. H. 17 in. W. 21 in. E. Perelli. 1875.
An example of still-life, perfect in drawing, finish, and color. There is originality in the grapes being represented as partly withered.
49. THE EMIGRANT'S LETTER. H. 20 in. W. 16 in. By Howard Helmick. 1868.
Mr. Helmick is a native of Washington city, now following his art in London, where he has met brilliant success in painting subjects of Irish rustic life. This picture represents a French peasant's family listening to a letter from an emigrant brother.
50. LEISURE AND LABOR. H. 15 in. W. 23 in. By F. B. Mayer. 1853.
The hackneyed subject of a village blacksmith shop is here treated with great originality, fine color, and contrast in the figures, which well illustrate the aptness of the title. Mr. Mayer is a Baltimore artist of high repute. This picture has been engraved.

55. THE FORTUNE-TELLER. H. 12 in. W. 16 in. On panel. C. Maccari.
A work of Roman genre, by a Roman artist. The aged prophetess, seated in her "curiosity shop" of ancient and curious wares, foretells by the cards on her chair-arm the fortune of the fashionable lady, who, with downcast eyes, listens with an expression evidently not dissatisfied. The face and form of the fortune-teller is executed in a style worthy of a Flemish master.
56. FLOWER-PIECE. H. 14 in. W. 17 in. By E. G. Couder. 1872.
A gem from this eminent French flower-painter.

57. VASE OF FLOWERS. H. 33 in. x 24 in. W. By G. C. Jeannin. 1873.
A fine example of the new and difficult style of color in flower pieces, so much in vogue with the artists of France. In the hands of an indifferent artist the prominent blue curtain would have been fatal to the work; but here it is safely grouped with the simple flower and the gilt vase, in one mass of harmonious color.
58. FRUIT. H. 19 in. x 26 in. W. Saint Jean. 1855.
Its free handling and melting, juicy tints are in striking contrast with the clear linear style and moderate color of Preyer.
59. HIGH BANK, GENESEE RIVER. H. 30 in. x 48 in. W. By J. F. Kensett. 1857.
60. SNOW SCENE—MOONRISE. H. 21½ in. x 33½ in. W. By Emile Breton. 1873.
The ruddy disk of the rising moon glows through the mist of a winter evening over an ordinary landscape, a cottage, a bridge, and some leafless trees, in which turkeys roost. Such are the simple materials, simply treated, of an effective picture.
- 61, 62. THE HAPPY AND UNHAPPY FAMILIES. H. 33 in. x 28 in. W. By F. De Brackeleer. 1852.
These beautifully painted interiors are by an artist of eminence in Antwerp.
- 63, 64. CABINET INTERIORS. H. 8 in. x 10 in. W. By De Marne.
These gems will repay a close examination, and originally cost a large sum.
65. FRUIT. H. 20 in. x 21 in. W. A. Preyer. 1842.
66. PREPARING FOR CHURCH. H. 18 in. x 22 in. W. Ed. Frère. 1835.
In this early work by one of the leading genre painters of France are seen the fine perception of character and natural treatment that have made him so famous. From the J. Taylor Johnston collection.
67. THE LONG STORY. An Interior on panel. H. 17 in. x 22 in. W. By William S. Mount. 1837.
One of the best pictures of an artist who may justly be termed the Wilkie of America, by his close observation and portrayal of rustic incidents, and his success in making them essentially American in character.
It represents a real scene witnessed by the artist, who knew all the characters in it. When engraved, it furnished the theme of a story by Seba Smith. It occurred in a country bar-room—perhaps a railway station, as a time-table is affixed to the wall—and the sitting figures seem to be taking “something hot” until the train arrives. The man on the left with a bandage around his head, a bandana handkerchief bound over his knee, and a crutch lying across his lap, looks rather like a hard character; an impression confirmed by the “deck” of cards slipping out of his big hat lying on the floor. He is evidently a bar-room lounge, and perhaps has called for the purpose of getting up “a little game” with any stray traveller. The standing figure is a country doctor, who has dropped in with his smoking friend, and, directing the latter’s attention to the lame man, makes a bet with him that their rough companion cannot answer the simplest question in a half-hour’s time. The smoker then asks the lame man whether the hurt on his bandaged leg is above or below the knee. The latter, at once, with eager eyes and pointed finger, goes into a long, discursive account of how he got hurt. As the half-hour expires, the smoker bored, and somewhat serious over the lost wager, puffs his smoke towards the narrator, while the doctor looks down sideways at him, and, though his eyes are concealed by the cap, his lips evidently say, “Didn’t I tell you so?”
In this, as in all of his comic illustrations, Mount never overstepped the barrier between genuine humor and caricature. He was the son of a farmer on Long Island, and was in early life a sign-painter. He had a studio on wheels, with a plate-glass front, in which, drawn by a pair of horses, he could select any point of view he wished, and thus protected from the weather, leisurely make his careful studies.

 "How he had wrought his signs in Egypt, and his wonders in the field of Zoar; and hath turned their rivers into blood; and their floods, that they could not drink."—Psalms lxxviii, 43, 44.
 This picture took the special gold medal, awarded at the Exhibition of the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, for the best picture, without regard to school, style, or subject, by a living artist.
 Aside from the power displayed in portraying such fearful suffering, the finely drawn groups and single figures furnish abundant examples to the student of historical composition.
2. SOURCE OF THE POTOMAC. $\begin{matrix} \text{H.} & \text{W.} \\ 6 \text{ ft.} & \times 5 \text{ ft.} \end{matrix}$ Painted by A. H. Clements. 1879.

 A copy of a touching group made for a monument in the early part of the sculptor's career, which first called public attention to his genius, and led to his being sent to Italy for study of his art.

OCTAGON ROOM.

Greek Slave, &c.

1. THE GREEK SLAVE.

H.
5 ft. 2 in.

In marble.

By Hiram Powers. 1846.

The sculptor of this beautiful work was born in Vermont in 1805. He went to Ohio when young, and, after trying various ways of earning a living, he attached himself to a museum of wax-work, and there showed his genius for modelling in wax. Having been taught by a German how to model in clay and plaster, his skill in bust-making soon attracted the notice of many friends, among whom was Mr. Longworth, of Cincinnati. He came to Washington city in 1835, and here his life-like busts of distinguished men—particularly of Chief-Justice Marshall, now in the United States Supreme Court-room—at once established his fame. Senator Preston, of South Carolina, introduced him to his brother, General Preston, of Columbia, S. C., a gentleman of fortune and refined taste, who at once furnished Powers with the means of going to Italy, and subsequently, on joining him there, befriended him, and in his own carriage took the artist for the first time to Rome in 1846.

In Italy the merits of his busts were at once recognized, and very soon he displayed his genius in ideal works. The Greek Slave was his first statue. It placed his name at once among the leading sculptors of Europe, and its exhibition throughout the United States was very popular. Five copies of the original have been made by the sculptor; and though it was followed by other ideal statues of a national character, the Greek Slave has ever held the first place in the estimation of his countrymen. His statue of Eve was also made for his patron, General Preston. It now belongs to A. T. Stewart, Esq., of New York.

Much has been said and written of over-wrought praise and sharp condemnation of this work. In his own words, the artist designed it to represent "a beautiful woman in a position of humiliation and sorrow, but elevated above it by conscious faith. Her father and mother are destroyed. Gather all this affliction together, add to them fortitude and resignation, and there is no room for shame." Whatever may be the final judgment upon the work, there is no statue that breathes a finer sentiment of purity, while its exquisite execution appears faultless.

Mr. Powers never returned to America, but closed his long life of industry and honor at Florence in 1873.

2. BACCHANTE.

Bust in marble.

By Galt.

This work is by a native of Virginia, who, had he lived longer, must have attained the highest honors in ideal sculpture. In early manhood, while in the Confederate service, he died near Richmond. It shows a fine conception of the subject, and the treatment of it is simple and natural. The charm of the head consists in the just limit which the artist has put to its bacchanalian expression. Here is no wild look nor leering grimace peering under a mass of grape-leaves. A simple wreath of the vine crowns the lovely head, and a subdued vinous joyousness mantles the face, and shines in the mirthful eyes and smiling lips.

3. PENSEROSO.

Bust in marble.

By W. H. Rinehart.

An early work of this sculptor.

4. THE VEILED NUN.

Bust in marble.

A good copy of a work that shows how delicately marble may be wrought to imitate the human features under a gauzy veil.

5. BUST OF SHAKESPEARE.

In marble.

6. GENEVRA. Bust in marble. By Hiram Powers.
- This was the first ideal bust made by Powers, and was executed in Florence for Mrs. Preston, as a token of gratitude for the assistance given by her husband to the sculptor. The name also is ideal. Powers described it as representing "a passionless woman, a woman with a heart and soul, and all the finer attributes of humanity, but unacknowledged by herself, and not developed by any prevailing expression." It was modelled and chiselled by the sculptor's own hands, and the face is considered as having much more latent strength of expression than is given in most of his ideal heads. It has been somewhat defaced, but not fatally so. The arrangement and execution of the hair is nobly beautiful.

7. PROSERPINE. Bust in marble. By Hiram Powers.
- As the Geneva showed the dawn of Powers' ideal genius, so the Proserpine represents its full meridian, as it was made twenty years after the former, and sent as another testimonial of gratitude to Mrs. Preston. It is a duplicate of the Proserpine in the possession of Mr. Carey, of Philadelphia, with this difference, that the latter represents the lovely bosom imbedded in tube-roses, in keeping with the story of Proserpine when Pluto found her
- "Gathering flowers,
Herself a fairer flower."
- The pedestals of both busts were designed by Mr. Powers.

1. ENDYMION. $\begin{matrix} L. \\ 4 \text{ ft. } 4\frac{1}{2} \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 2 \text{ ft. } 2 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Marble. W. H. Rinehart.
- One of the many versions of the story of Endymion, the young herdsman, is that Zeus, (Jupiter,) his reputed father, gave him immortal youth and eternal sleep. Enamored of the sleeping boy, the Moon (Selene) had him conveyed to Mount Latmos, where she could privately gaze upon and kiss his unconscious cheek. To illustrate this fable the sculptor has given us a comely shepherd-boy stretched in repose upon a sheepskin covering a sloping rock. The careless, easy posture of the limbs, and the expression of calm repose of the perfectly modelled form, stamp this work in the estimation of many as Rinehart's great master-piece. It was executed in 1874.
2. YOUTH AS A BUTTERFLY. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 5 \text{ ft.} \end{matrix}$ E. Caroni, Florence.
- The Italian catalogue of the statuary in the Annex building of the Centennial states that this statue represents "first youth in the form of a butterfly, which, while flying over the pleasures of life, is entangled in a net that awakens to Reality." The graceful poise, startled look, and delicate limbs of this figure, combined with elaborate execution of the flowers and net, make it a notable example of the picturesque style of the modern Italian sculpture. Caroni is a native of Switzerland.
3. FORCED PRAYER. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 2 \text{ ft. } 10 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ P. Guarnerio, Milan.
- Though verging upon caricature, the sculptor has made it a general favorite, by skilfully relieving its serio-comic suppressed grief by the winning sweetness of the child's form and folded hands.
4. THE FIRST STEP. $\begin{matrix} H. \\ 2 \text{ ft. } 5 \text{ in.} \end{matrix}$ Trombetta, Milan.
- Both child and chick are evidently making their first start in life together. The nest and empty egg-shell in the rear must not be overlooked.
